CURTIN AT HOME.

His Old Friends Give Him the Cold Shoulder—Joy of the Copperheads.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BELLEFONTE, Penn., Sept. 28.—The reception given to Ex-Gov. Andrew G. Curtin here this evening, was one of the most extraordinary demonstrations of this extraordinary political campaign. Gov. Curtin arrived at his old home in this village at 9 o'clock last evening, after an absence of three years, and was met at the depot by a miscellaneous crowd of Democrats, among whom he looked in vain to see the face of a single one of his old friends and neighbors who delighted to honor him in the past. He took lodgings at the Bush House, where he has remained all day to-day, as decidedly as if he had been a stranger in the town. Not a Republican of any note in the village, even his former most intimate friends, has condescended to call on him or notice his arrival in any way; but on the contrary he is most bitterly denounced on all sides and is politically and socially ostracized. Even his own relations have nothing but pity to express for him, and some of them refuse him even that consolation. He has one brother, three half-brothers, and one brother-in-law residing here, all of whom denounce the political act by which he has destroyed the reputation of a lifetime. I am assured by Republicans of all classes that he will not have a single follower in Bellefonte, which has a population of 3,000, and not five in the whole County of Centre, with a population of 48,000. The reception given him to-night was a demonstration gotten up wholly by Democrats, none but Democratic houses were illuminated, none but Democrats walked in the procession, and the bonfires, music and torches were all Democratic. Republicans stood upon the sidewalk and watched in silence and astonishment, a parade of five or six hundred Copperhead Democrats, in honor of the man who for ten years past they have stigmatized with every opprobrious epithet at their command. One of the transparencies bore the inscription, "Our Andy, the great war Governor." A Republican standing by me said, as this transparency passed by: "Well, if that isn't the limit of impudence. When we used to call Andy Curtin the great war Governor he was denounced by his fellows as the nigger worshiper and foot of the tyrant Lincoln." The whole demonstration appeared to the people of this village as the most absurd and unnatural thing that ever occurred, and it must have been extremely mortifying to the person in whose honor it was gotten up. The course of the Ex-Governor has had the effect of arousing the Republicans of this town as they were never aroused before, and the Chairman of the County Committee told me today that up to the time of Curtin's apostasy he had all the local work of the party on his hands, but now every Republican had organized himself into a Committee of one, and was working as though he were responsible for the whole party. The vote of Bellefonte usually numbers about 800, with a Republican majority of seventy or eighty. This year they say the majority will reach 100. The Democratic majority of the county averages about 500, but it will be less instead of greater in October in consequence of Curtin's course.

The soldiers' vote will be unanimous for Harbaugh. As proof of this fact, a sentry in the village called on Curtin today, and, extending his hand, said:

"How are you, Governor? Do you recollect when you presented your regiment with that flag?"

"Yes," replied the Governor, "I recollect it."

"Well, now, Governor, I want to tell you that Gen. Hartranft never allowed that flag to trail in the dust, and he is bound to be elected Governor of this State."

Curtin replied: "All right; I have nothing to say against Gen. Hartranft."

FAILURE OF BOSTON BANKERS.

Spencer, Villa & Co. Suspend—Their Liabilities Reported to be Large.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 28.—Spencer, Villa & Co., bankers, on Congress-street and square, failed at noon today. Their checks have been returned. It was the general impression on the street, when the suspension was first reported, that the firm had been negotiating largely in Vermont Central, but the most trustworthy brokers were of the opinion that nothing could have been lost on those securities, and that the trouble had been brewing for some time, owing to speculation in New-York stocks. The failure has caused considerable commotion on the street, as the liabilities of the firm are said to be large. It is represented by Jas. Villa and Jas. F. Waldwell, Mr. A. W. Spencer having retired from the firm about two years ago. The firm stood high on the street, and their failure is generally regretted.

Fire at Hartford—Partial Destruction of a Paper-Box Factory.

HARTFORD, Conn., Sept. 28.—A fire broke out in the paper-box room situated in the second story of the Meriden Britannia Company's works, to-day. The building is divided into five fire-proof compartments, and the fire was principally confined to the first compartment and the second floor. The flames were quickly extinguished, but not until damage had been done to the extent of $50,000. There is an insurance of $20,000 on the building, which was flooded by the patent hose of the company and further damage by fire averted.

Close of the Trial of Mrs. Fair—The Jury Retire.

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 27.—The trial of Mrs. Laura Fair for the murder of Col. Crittenden was concluded today. An immense crowd assembled to see and hear the Court-room to hear the closing argument for the defense by M. Greene Curtis. At the conclusion of his argument the jury received a charge from Judge Sanders, and retired at 4¾ o'clock P. M.

Arrest for Perjury.

BALTIMORE, Md., Sept. 28.—Rudolph Blumenberg was arrested today on a process from the United States District Court of this city on a presentation by the grand jury for perjury in false swearing in the noted liquor cases tried here in March last. Blumenberg was arrested in Washington, and gave bail in $5,000 for his appearance on Monday next.

Losses by the Cleveland Fire.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, Sept. 28.—The following is a correct statement of the losses by the fire which broke out in Hones & Davison's planing-mill Friday night: Woods, Perry & Co., $60,000; insured for $25,000 in the Etna, North British and Mercantile and Commercial Companies. Hones & Davison, $27,000; insured for $9,000; Potter & Birchall, $8,000; no insurance; insured for $2,500; Atlantic and Great Western Railroad Company, $4,000; no insurance; T. H. Bullock, $4,500; insured for $2,000.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

A Honduras City Attacked by Indians—The Vice-President of San Salvador Assassinated.

KINGSTON, Sept. 25, via HAVANA, Sept. 27.—Advices from Belize, British Honduras, state that the Indians had committed a raid on the City of Belize. A British man-of-war and a detachment of troops have been dispatched to Belize.

The steam-ship Virginius left Puerto Cabello on the 8th inst.

Central American advices state that the Vice-President of San Salvador had been assassinated. The Nicaraguan authorities had rejected the proposed loan of Hart & Company. The relations of Guatemala and Costa Rica were undisturbed.

WEST INDIES.

Government Changes in Cuba—Increase of Import and Export Duties in Hayti.

HAVANA, Sept. 27, via KEY WEST, Fla., Sept. 28.—Count Cimongo, the President of the Havana Board of Aldermen, assumed the Governorship yesterday. The Havana journals say Gov. Kindelan has obtained leave of absence.

Late Hatien advices have been received. The import duties of the island have been increased twenty-five per cent., and the export duties twenty per cent.

South American advices received here state that affairs in Peru are quiet. A misunderstanding had broken out between Bolivia and Chili.

Five hundred coolies, with $70,000 of their own savings, have returned to their homes in China.

KINGSTON, Sept. 26, via HAVANA, Sept. 27.—The Colonial Secretary has notified the Royal Mail Steam-ship Company that the contract for carrying the mails from Jamaica will terminate in 1873. The Secretary alleges that subsidizing mail steamers is a bad policy.

THE KEYSTONE STATE.

The Political Outlook—Effect of Curtin's Letter—Its Efforts of no Avail.

From Our Own Correspondent.

HARRISBURG, Friday, Sept. 27, 1872.

If a line be drawn from near the southwest corner of the map of Pennsylvania to a point nearly one-third the length of the northern boundary from its eastern terminus, or, more exactly stated, from the north-western corner of Greene County to the same corner of Bradford County, all the territory north-west of the line taken together, is in the political character largely Republican. Not more than two counties lying wholly above that line—Clarion and Elk, are Democratic. The list of Republican counties in the same region contains Erie, Crawford, Warren, Mercer, Venango, Forrest, McKean, Potter, Cameron, Tioga, Jefferson, Armstrong, Indiana, Lawrence, Beaver, Butler and Allegheny. Your correspondent has obtained what he regards as trustworthy information of the Republican prospects in nearly every one of these counties. In many of them he has been personally, and has talked with as many people as possible, aiming to become familiar with the opinions of the well informed of both parties where it was possible. He has been permitted to know what work the Republican organizations are doing. From counties which he has not visited he has taken pains to get the best information possible, and oftentimes it has been very direct and specific. On all this information is based the greater portion of the following statement:

The total majority in these counties for Auditor-General last year was 15,043. Taken together they will not give a less majority for Hartranft this year. In several of these counties there will be a handsome increase of Republican strength upon last year. In two or three can there be any important decrease, and there may be none even in them; so that it is confidently expected there will be an increase in the total majority given in these counties, and it is not improbable it may be as much as 4,000 or 5,000. Allegheny County last year gave a majority of 3,780. It gave Gov. Geary three years ago 4,587. The majority this year is regarded as sure to be 6,000, and it may be as high as 9,000. Fifteen hundred to 1,500 German votes that were against Stanton last year are secure to Hartranft this, and then there is a large body of miners who are greatly dissatisfied with Bucklew's record last Winter in the Legislature on questions touching their interests, and many of them will vote for Hartranft. If they should do so generally his majority will be very large. Erie County last year gave Stanton 1,324 majority, and Geary, three years ago, 2,165. This year the majority for Hartranft is claimed as 2,800 at the lowest, and the feeling and general opinion among the well informed is that it will be 3,000. Warren County has been well canvassed, and the returns show 800 majority, against 561 last year. Potter and Tioga Counties will not, probably, vary much from the majorities of last year, but are likely to show a very small gain, rather than the reverse. Together they will give 2,400 majority. Jefferson, Forrest and McKean are very close, and either would be made Democratic by the change of a few votes. The Republicans are working hard to hold them, and expect to succeed. Cameron County has only a marum of fifty votes. Two railroads are building in the county, and there is an increased list of votes by the laborers upon them, who have been in the county long enough to vote. This increased vote is pretty well divided for Grant and Greeley, but will, it is feared, be almost wholly thrown for Bucklew and give the county to him in October. The result is uncertain. The Republican county ticket will be chosen by an increased majority. Mercer County will increase its majority of last year, which was 816, by about one hundred votes. There has been considerable defection in Lawrence County. General, but probably truthful, advices from there indicate that it is not likely to reduce the majority of last year. The county which more than any other in the north-western portion of the State, and probably than any in the whole State besides, suffers from anything that has even the appearance of disorganization in the Republican ranks, is Crawford. It is a county notorious for its political dissensions. It is always in trouble, and there are several aspirants for political favors, who are always sore-headed and ready to make a disturbance when the offices do not go around to them all. There was at first a cry that went up for Greeley, so loud that the Republican organization seemed for a time to have been fairly shaken by the uproar. It proved to be little more than a "sound and fury." The work of organizing has been revived, and a canvass is now making. It shows that the dissatisfaction is confined to Titusville, Meadville, and Conneaut. The Liberal Committee claim four hundred Greeley Republicans. The canvass does not yet reveal half that number. But the Republican Committee is ready to concede four hundred Greeley Republicans, and then save the majority of last year and even increase it slightly. It was then 960. If there was no defection as all, with a full vote it would be 1,800.

Venango County was for a time in apparently as confused a condition as Crawford. But the County Committee was early at work and have secured a splendid organization, and the canvass shows a majority of six hundred against 568 last year. What is known as the oil region, is embraced mainly in Crawford, Venango and Clarion Counties. The oil producers have been political missionaries. This whole region was Democratic before the discovery of oil, but all the counties except Clarion have been redeemed. The oil discoveries in Clarion have been out recent, and the majority, which was 1,088 Democratic, is promised to be cut down to half that number this time. The journey of Emma Low through this region did not help his cause. He made an unfavorable impression, and secured but small audiences. Harbaugh, on the contrary, was well received, and his appearance removed much of the prejudice against him.

It is useless to deny that there are Republicans in considerable numbers in the north-western counties who will vote for Greeley, or who, as I hear, now declare their intention. In some of the counties there are thirty to fifty, in others a hundred or two. The Republican Committees know them, and know also where the increased Republican vote which will offset all the defection is to come from. The number of Democrats who in the November election will vote for Grant will nearly or quite equal the number of Greeley Republicans, but these same Democrats will generally vote for Bucklew in October. The new vote is almost wholly to be cast for Hartranft, except that which comes from naturalization, and that will be considerably divided. In this State Democrats always vote, and little effort is required to bring them out, but there is a large Republican reserve force which only important issues bring to the polls. This will call it be out in October, and is relied for Hartranft. Besides, there are frequent changes in his favor, and lately many persons who have been opposing him have publicly returned to their party allegiance. The Republican organization is most excellent, and except in a few counties, could not be improved. The Democratic organization is bad, and in several counties is demoralized and doing almost nothing. The leaders are well aware that they are fighting a losing battle so far as national issues are concerned, and the only hope they have is that they may possibly carry the State for Bucklew. It should not be omitted that many Republicans who propose to vote for Greeley also declare they will vote for Hartranft. Some of these do so because Bucklew is personally a most obnoxious candidate for them, and some of them do so for the reason that they are earnest in their claims that they still belong to the Republican Party. As one leaves the western counties Greeleyism grows less, and there are many counties in the central part of the State where not one Greeley Republican has yet been found.

The laboring men of all the counties in question are exceedingly favorable to Grant and Wilson, and the national Republican ticket will receive a large portion, perhaps half, of the Irish vote. The more intelligent, among them are satisfied with their wages and steady employment, and are afraid a change in the Administration may affect their interests injuriously. There are a number of the natives of Sweden, settled in groups, in two or three of the counties, who are to vote this year for the first time. They are working hard for Greeley, the Republican ticket. There will be about fifty in Titusville.

Gov. Curtin's letter has now been read throughout the State. The Liberals and Democrats are trying to make something out of it. But, thus far, they cannot point to an individual in the State and say his vote has been changed by Curtin's letter. Had he identified himself boldly with the movement against Hartranft a month ago, when sentiment was less settled than it is now, he might have had some influence. It is now too late for his efforts to have any effect worth upon himself. Alexander McClure has been about the State boasting that he could compel Curtin to do as he wanted him to, and this has not prepared the way for Curtin's letter to inflame the Stalwarts who are opposed to "rings." The most bitter enemy he has, they term the "Cameron ring," if his enemies be honest and earnest, with some cause except that he cannot get into it, is the last person to secure a transfer of the State to a "McClure ring." Even if Andy Curtin be a member of it. Another weak will enable one to judge more accurately of the effect of Curtin's remarkable recovery and participation in State politics. But thus far it has been without effect.

WARD'S ISLAND INSANE ASYLUM

Investigation by the Emigration Commissioners—Testimony of Dr. Reidel—The Treatment of the Patients.

At the last meeting of the Emigration Commissioners a Special Committee consisting of Commissioners E. D. Hart, Jas. Lynch, Geo. J. Forrest, William Wallach and Bernard Casserly were appointed to visit and report on the condition of the Asylum for the Insane Emigrants on Ward's Island. The Committee yesterday assembled in the Warden's office, for the purpose of taking the testimony of Dr. Reidel, the Physician-in-Chief, and Warden Wardner.

Dr. Reidel testified as follows: I have been in charge of the Insane Asylum for two years; there were 145 inmates when I took charge; there are now 163; I classify them according to the nature of their disease, as far as the arrangements of the building will allow; the arrangements don't permit of all the divisions advisable; they are not sufficient to enable us to classify the excited patients as they should be; I now keep a register of patients; I did not do so until within the last four months; it is a well-established fact that for every two patients one physician is necessary; I stated to the Chairman of the Ward's Island Committee, Mr. Lynch, repeatedly, that the physicians cannot keep the history of 160 patients without clerical aid; a short time before my accession a Polish woman escaped; it was supposed she escaped by a boat and she was never heard from again; a patient who was last recovering from melancholy escaped one morning with some workmen, and about the same time the body of another patient was found floating in the river; there was a Coroner's inquest, and the jury returned a verdict of accidental death; in the same year another patient escaped and was never heard of; about that time a young Englishman named Hancock attempted to escape; he was pursued by the keepers and jumped into the river and was drowned; in my opinion he did not intend to commit suicide; shortly after that occurrence, a patient named Michael O'Hare jumped in the river, and was also drowned; a young Englishman, while taking a bath on a hot day, on the eve of his discharge, was drowned; another patient dropped dead a few moments after his admission; in cases where I have no knowledge of the patient, I first put them in a strong room, no matter whether they are quiet or no; this is to ascertain the nature of their disease, because it often happens that persons suffering from acute mania, and who are dangerous when taken to the Asylum, are for the time quiet, owing to the new surroundings, but liable at any time to break out; I treat patients in the way I learned to treat them in Germany; in cases of melancholy I used opium and other narcotics, but I have arrived at the conclusion that what is conducive to a speedy cure in Germany does not effect the same results in this country; I have now given up altogether the use of narcotics; my course now is to let my patient individual alone.

In answer to a question of the Chairman, the witness here stated that the medical force in the Asylum was not sufficient to make the complete medical and scientific examinations sometimes necessary, and also that the attendants were incompetent and not fit for the number. The incompetency the witness attributed to insufficient remuneration; the nurse's salary, he said, was $19 a month.

With regard to the clothing of the patients he stated that it was insufficient; that he had made repeated requisitions for other clothing, but without effect; it often occurs that patients are not well treated by attendants; the attendants are frequently discharged, and this tells against the general efficiency of the Asylum.

All over the world, said the witness, except in the County of New-York, insane asylums are in charge of medical men. I am frequently obliged to discharge patients before they are entirely cured, because of insufficient accommodation. I think it is necessary for obtaining the best results that a physician should have charge of the whole Asylum. Its entire management, the correspondence, the employment of and discharge of attendants, the visits of clergymen, should be under the supervision of the physician. As a shock, the physician said the Warden had a large duty on iron—I mean a duty like $10 per ton—would have led to a rapid duplication of our furnaces, and in a time like the present would have secured cheaper iron to us than we can. I still believe that. I believe it a duty had been placed at $10 per ton at the close of the war, and remained there, we should have had double our present number of furnaces and have been supplying ourselves with iron very much cheaper than we now get it, or could get it if the tariff were entirely abolished. Such is my position very plainly stated. You understand this, and I tell you it is not in the power of all the legislation on earth to put out the furnace fire of the Lehigh Valley of Pennsylvania for many years to come. According to all human probabilities it would be more from wasted than all the furnaces on earth can furnish, and consequently a price for iron above the cost of making it, for years to come, whatever may be the legislation of this or any other country.

Mr. Greeley then repeated his former speeches on the subjects of civil service reform and reconciliation, and in concluding, resumed his position on the train, which then moved toward New-York.

MR. GREELEY'S ARRIVAL.

Several hundred people gathered about the Pavonia Ferry, at the foot of Chambers-street, yesterday afternoon, to welcome back the stump candidate for the Presidency from his Western tour. The crowd consisted mostly of ragamuffins, although John Cochrane, Mr. Sinclair and a few of Mr. Greeley's prominent supporters were present. When the Philosopher stepped from the boat he was welcomed with prolonged cries of Hey! Hey! as if the spectators were impressed with an appreciation of his agricultural pursuits. Mr. Greeley, escorted by several of his friends, was handed into a carriage, seeming much fattened by his Western trip, and was rapidly driven away.

Reception at the Lincoln Club-Rooms.

For some reason or other, of which no satisfactory explanation was given, the programme for the evening was not carried out. It was intended to have given Mr. Greeley a reception at the Spingler House, the Democratic Head-quarters; it took place, however, at the Lincoln Club-rooms, in Twenty-first-street, and by order of Gen. John Cochrane. By 8 o'clock about a hundred persons had assembled in and in front of the Club-house. Mr. Greeley arrived shortly before 9. Among those present were George F. Coachman, John Cochrane, William H. Van Clief, Esq., Mudcatt, Joel G. Pilsbury, Whitelaw Reid, Charles C. Clark, Augustus Schell, H. L. Stewart, Alfred Wilkinson and Samuel C. Tabor. The reception was a rough and tumble affair. First of all, one end of the room had to be cleared—a task of extreme difficulty—and then the hand-shaking began. To encourage the others, one individual with an unnaturally red face shouted out at the top of his voice, "All you who want to shake hands with the old gentleman, come on." Mr. Greeley looked embarrassed, but said nothing. The next moment somebody as the other end of the room called for "three cheers for Young America," and the cheers were given again and again. Another, a person with long hair, who appeared to be in a state of intense excitement, exclaimed: "We will all vote for you as the South, Mr. Greeley. Hurrah! Hip-hip!" The house at last subsided, and then Mr. Greeley walked to the centre-table, rested one hand thereon and spoke as follows:

If any good has come from my recent journey, the credit of that is due to our Committees—the National Democratic and Liberal Republican Committees—at whose suggestion I went, and without whose concurring judgment I should have refused to go. I was greatly pressed to go and see the people in the Western States of the Union. I consulted the two Committees on the subject, and their judgment concurring in favor of the journey, I made it on the strength of their opinion. I think, friends, it has done good. [Cheers.] We have no principles that we wish to hide, nothing of any sort that we wish to conceal. And the public mind was clouded, and needed to be clarified. I think I made it clear that the Liberal movement is not a coalition of disconnected elements, but a union of the people on well-defined principles in which they are all agreed. [Loud cheering.] So, then, allow me to cease. I don't mean to be tortured into saying another word to the end of the canvass. I have explained myself as fully as seems necessary, and I trust that the good work may go on. [Renewed cheering.] I think we have been strengthened during the past two weeks. I think that Pennsylvania is omens if we have a fair election; that Ohio is sure; and that Indiana can neither be defrauded nor bought, but will cast her vote for the Liberal candidates at the November election. I will only say, in closing, that I have been greatly cheered and strengthened by the demonstrations and enthusiasm which I have witnessed during the past twelve days.

Mr. Greeley, who evidently felt uneasy, suddenly left the room at the close of his remarks, and, in company with Gen. Cochrane, descended into the street and was soon lost to sight in the passing crowd.

The Extreme Penalty—Conviction of a Maryland Murderer.

HAGERSTOWN, Md., Sept. 28.—In the Circuit Court for Washington County, in the second trial of James Davis, for the murder of Abraham L. Lynn, on the 8th of April last, the jury today brought in a verdict of murder in the first degree. In the first trial the jury disagreed.

THE INDIANS.

Conference Between the President and the Delegation at Washington—Assurance of Toleration and Aid—The Fort Gibson Affair Denied.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 28.—The delegation of Indians now here representing the Unepapas, Blackfeet and Upper and Lower Yanctonians, headed by J. C. Conner, Agent of the Grand River Agency, and Assistant Secretary Cowan, had an interview with the President today. After they had shaken hands with the President, he inquired if there was anything special which they desired to say to him. "The Grass" stepped to the front, and, through an interpreter, said he never had anything against the white men. "You sent for me before, but I did not like to come; you sent for me again, and I came. I have seen you; I have been pleased; we want room at our reservation, and don't want to be crowded; we will mind the Great Father, and do what he tells us. Our people are all working, but are very poor."

The President inquired as to the nature of the land on which the tribe is located, and asked if anything had been said to them about moving them into the Indian country. Secretary Cowan replied in the affirmative. The President then, addressing the Indians, said he would like to see them on fertile lands, where it would be easy for them to make a living, and when they should be willing to go on such lands the Government would send them, and have them taught to build houses. Their young especially should be instructed. It was for them to think about, and unless they wanted to go he would not make them do so. They could go back to their homes now, and talk the matter over this year to their people. If they would not agree to go, he would use no measures to compel them. Above all things they should be at peace with the white people, who greatly outnumbered them, and if a conflict should ensue it would be much worse for the Indians. He did not want to fight them, but protect them and care for them. The President also admonished them that they should have their young people instructed, as the white people were increasing rapidly, and in a few years it would be much more difficult for them to sustain themselves in an uncivilized state. Anything they wanted now could be asked of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary of the Interior, who would not for him. "The Grass" said the land of his reservation was bad, and he was afraid in that country, and wanted to stay there. He knew it was not good, but wanted to stay on it, and did not want any white man to come on it. They also wanted Mr. Conner, their Agent, to remain there.

The President assured them that he charge their affairs, and further that he did not want to force them from the land. He would do all he could to instruct them and protect them, and hoped their young people would grow up instructed in all the arts of civilization.

As a result of official inquiry, instituted by the military authorities, it appears that the recent reports of threatened troubles in the Creek Nation, in which it was alleged that the United States troops from Fort Gibson were sustaining one side, were false. Col. Grierson, commanding at Fort Gibson, telegraphs that the troops did not interfere at all in the trouble in the Creek Nation. He alone met the head-men of both factions at their special request, and succeeded in bringing them together in friendly council, when the difficulties were amicably settled by themselves.

The Chickasaws in Council.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Sept. 28.—The Chickasaw Indian Legislature has passed a bill memorializing Congress to allot their lands in severalty, and calling on the Choctaws to join them in their request. This is regarded as an advanced step, opening the Indian Territory to white settlement this Winter.

Fifty Braves on Their Way to Washington.

ST. LOUIS, Sept. 28.—Henry E. Alvord, Special Indian Commissioner, and Enoch Hoag, Superintendent, arrived here this afternoon with fifty-one wild Indians from the country west of Arkansas and Texas. Ten different tribes are represented. They leave for Washington to-morrow.

An O'Brien Banner-Raising—Address by Senator O'Brien.

The Sixteenth Assembly District James O'Brien Association raised a banner, last evening, at Fifteenth-street and Avenue B. A well-executed likeness of Mr. O'Brien is displayed in the centre of the banner, which bears the following inscription: "People's choice Sixteenth Assembly District. For Mayor, James O'Brien, champion of Democracy and working men's rights."

Mr. O'Brien addressed the audience, and thanked the citizens of the Eighteenth Ward for the hearty reception they had given him that evening, and for the honors they had conferred upon him by placing him in the field for the proud distinction of occupying the civic chair in this City. All he should say was that, if successful, he would scrupulously fulfill the duties of that high office, as he had discharged those of other offices with which he was entrusted. They were not to be misled, he said, by corrupt newspapers that tried hard to misrepresent him. There was a corrupt ring in New-York, and that ring he had fought and conquered, and now those journals which supported that ring and shared in the spoils, turned round upon him, but could find not the shadow of a stain on his character, except a mere boyish freak for breaking the peace. He did not feel ashamed of that circumstance. If he should be placed in the Municipal chair, he assured them he would not forget the generous people who had elevated him by their suffrages to that envied and honored position. During the proceedings, one of the audience called for three cheers for Horace Greeley, but there was not the least response, not a single Greeley echo in the neighborhood to reply.

General Notes.

Samuel Hooper has been renominated for Congress from the Fourth District of Massachusetts.

The Grant and Wilson Club of Port Washington, Long Island, will raise their new banner to-morrow evening. Hon. L. B. Prince, Alexander Hagner, Esq., and Col. Wm. S. Cogswell will address the meeting.

A large meeting and banner-raising of the South Orange Grant and Wilson Club was held in Decker's Hall, on Friday evening. After a few words from the President, A. T. Metz, he introduced R. W. Throckmorton, Esq., of Bergen, who made a spirited address. He was followed by F. W. Newton, Esq., and others. After enrolling a number of new members, the meeting adjourned.

Local Notes.

The Sobieski Society has indorsed the nomination of President Grant. Dr. Mackenzie, a prominent member of the club, has donated $1,000 to the funds.

The several Grant and Wilson Democratic Clubs in this City will meet on Wednesday evening next, at the Germania Assembly Rooms, Twenty-sixth-street and Seventh-avenue, for the purpose of forming a central organization.

A meeting of the friends of James O'Brien was held last evening at Union Hall, No. 29 Third-avenue. Resolutions were adopted indorsing James O'Brien for the Mayoralty. The following officers were elected: Chairman, Thomas A. Godward; Secretary, William J. Holy.

At a meeting of the James O'Brien Club No. 1, of the Twentieth Ward, held on Friday evening, the following nominations were made: For Mayor, James O'Brien; for Congress, (Ninth District,) George W. McLaughlin; for Assembly, (Fifteenth District,) A. J. Coffey; for Assembly, (Eleventh District,) Nicholas Judge; for Alderman, Benjamin Stutman.

A Greeley and Brown banner-raising took place yesterday in Chamber-street, near Greenwich-street, D. W. C. Sandford President, and speeches were made by Frederick A. Seaver, Gen. H. A. Barnum, Hon. James Brooks and the notorious "Col." Newton. During the proceedings a carriage drove through containing Old Bonesty and Gen. Cochrane.

CRICKET AND BASE-BALL.

A Victory for the St. George Eleven—The Merions Defeated in One Inning.

Their signal defeat by the English eleven does not appear to have in any way disturbed the St. Georges, and they are preparing to make the closing weeks of the season more interesting in a cricket sense than was the beginning. Yesterday they met and defeated the Merions—a strong Philadelphia organization—in a one-day match at Hoboken, the St. George men playing only one inning, while their opponents were twice between the wickets. The visitors first took the bat and were disposed of for 81 runs, of which Messrs. A. Townsend and R. Ashbridge took contracted 11, the bowling of Meeran being noteworthy, the ball being knocked in the air in most instances, affording many chances for catches. The first representatives of the St. George, Messrs. Bance and Fortin, made a fine stay, the latter being caught out for 14, while Bance stood his ground until he had earned 44, when his stumps were knocked over by a ball from R. Ashbridge, closing a very noteworthy and brilliant innings. Messrs. Meeran and Bassett also ran up high scores, the former getting 15, while Mr. Bassett carried out his bat for 9, the total of the side, including byes and wides, being 118. The Merions were disposed of in the second inning for 44, Messrs. Lycett and Ewing, with 19 and 13 respectively, topping the list. Stumps were drawn at sunset, the St. Georges having won in one inning, by 118 to 95. The score was as follows:

MANHATTAN VS. KNICKERBOCKER.

A cricket match will take place at 10 o'clock on Thursday next, on the St. George ground, between eleven of the Manhattan Cricket Club against twenty-two of the Knickerbocker Base-ball Club.

Base-Ball—The Atlantics Defeat the Mutuals—Score 9 to 5.

The seventh game of the series between the Mutuals and Atlantics took place on the Capitoline Grounds, Brooklyn, yesterday, in presence of about 400 spectators. The Atlantics took the lead from the outset, and virtually won in the third inning by scoring five runs, one chiefly to errors of Hicks and Hatfield, the latter of whom was unwell and in no condition for playing. Pearce and McMullin were also credited with errors, but the latter batted well and made several good catches. The Atlantics batted excellently, batting finely and fielding well, although the runs scored by the Mutuals were all obtained on errors, notably too high throws by Ferguson. The following is a score of the match:

MUTUAL.	R.	I. B.	P. O.	A.	ATLANTIC.	R.	I. B.	P. O.	A.

[NOTE.—This was the seventh game of the series, the first having been won by the Atlantics and the following five by the Mutuals.]

GAMES ARRANGED.

The following games will take place on the Union Ground next week: Monday, Sept. 30, Eckford vs. Baltimore; Tuesday, Mutual vs. Baltimore; Wednesday, Mutual vs. Atlantic.

TIMES VS. HERALD.

The TIMES Nine have this year played eleven games, of which they have won nine. Yesterday they met and defeated the Herald Club, on the Capitoline, by a score of 18 to 11, as follows:

INNINGS.	1st.	2d.	3d.	4th.	5th.	6th.	7th.	8th.	9th.
Times	7	2	2	1	1	1	0	0	4
Herald	1	0	4	2	0	1	0	1	2—11

The result of this game decides the championship of newspaper clubs.

A Drawn Game Between the Athletic and Baltimore Clubs.

PHILADELPHIA, Sept. 28.—This afternoon a match game of base-ball was played between the Athletic and Baltimore Clubs. At the end of the ninth inning the game was a tie, each Club having made seven runs. It was then decided to consider the game a drawn one, and to play another championship game on Monday. The score by innings was:

	1st.	2d.	3d.	4th.	5th.	6th.	7th.	8th.	9th.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

"FOR YE HAVE THE POOR ALWAYS WITH YOU."

BY ALICE ROBBER.

BEFORE THE EXCURSION.

O, mother, mother! What do you think!
Wash out my best red gown;
No matter for parents, teacher and
We're going out of the town.

We're going out of the dusty streets,
And over the water, cool.
I couldn't hardly believe it, when
They told me so at school.

It's the country, Madalen Jackson says,
Under the great wide sky,
And where there are thousands of green, green
trees,
And never a brick house nigh.

She says there are flowers growing wild,
O, won't it be sweet to see?
I'm almost wild with the very thought
Test this should happen to me.

For I never saw so much as a field,
Or a river, running blue;
Or the woods where oaks and pine trees grow
In the sunshine and the dew.

But Madalen has. She came from a land
Where the flowers grow all the year;
But she lives in this dirty old alley now—
Though she won't stay long, I fear.

Her father's the organ-man who grinds
The tunes out you like so well;
They came from Italy, long ago—
He and Maddy and Nell.

And Madalen sang till her voice was gone,
And now she's so sick and white!
She can't go singing to earn her bread,
But coughs all the day and night.

But oh! she is so happy to think she'll go
Where the soft winds blow so cool,
That I found her crying as hard as she could,
When I came home from school.

O, mother, it never can rain to-morrow,
It surely never can rain!
We're going at six in the early day—
Me and Kitty and Jane.

They're dressing the spendid steamer up
With colors and flowers and flags;
And I saw them carrying on a dray
Such boxes, bundles, and bags!

And they say we'll all have an apple apiece,
And plenty of cake and pie;
And a whole brass band are going along,
Why it almost makes me cry.

To think what a happy time we'll have,
For a whole bright, merry day!
I only wish I'd a nicer gown,
And a longer time to stay.

And Bessy's going, lame as she is—
Going, crutches and all
Her father drinks, and her mother scolds,
And she has to tend the stall;

But to-morrow her face it will shine so bright
She'll never think of the pain,
The doctors say that she may not live
To see the Summer again.

And oh! we may shout and laugh and sing
Till the sun hangs red and low;
And there isn't a single cent to pay—
If there was, we couldn't go.

AFTER THE EXCURSION.

O, mother, we've had such a happy time!
I couldn't begin to tell—
There were hundreds and hundreds got aboard
By the time they rang the bell.

The water sparkled like jewel-stones,
White sails shone all around;
I felt so happy I couldn't speak
When the mighty boat swung round.

And the flags blew out, and the boys hurrahed,
And the band began to play,
And the winds that came from the far, wide sea
Seemed to sweep our cares away.

We just forgot we were poor and patched;
And Madalen never smiled,
But the light that shone in her happy eyes
Made her look like another child.

And little Bessy with folded hands
And a face as white as snow,
It was better to see her quiet joy
Than the finest, rarest show,

And the music, mother!—the merry tunes,
As we floated away, away!
I thought we were going straight to heaven,
To spend one Summer day.

And when we landed there were trees
Far as the eye could reach;
And swings to the groves and merry games,
And a welcome word for each.

I'll never forget it, mother, never;
I'll see it in my dreams—
Those pretty flowers, those wildwood paths,
And the purling, silvery streams.

And kind hands gave us plenty of cake,
And red-ripe apples and plums,
And bread and butter as sweet as nuts—
We never get in the slums.

O, mother, what good, great hearts they be
To give us such sweet delight!
I'm sure the dear Lord will bless them all;
I'll pray him to, each night.

And I'll never say in my soul again,
When I pass their homes so fair,
"They have got all their hearts can wish;
For the poor they never care."

And, mother, some time, oh! some blessed time,
Perhaps, when a woman grown,
I'll take you out of this wretched life,
Away from these alleys of stone.

And I'll build you a tiny cottage,
Where the sward is soft and green.
If I ever could live in the country, I'd be
As happy as any queen.

Out of this terrible squalor and dirt,
Into the sunny air,
Only to hear the birds and see
God's dear Heaven everywhere!

THE LOST SONG.

Written for the New-York Times.

It was my grandmother's story, and this is how she came to tell it to me:

I, Annie Rae, had come down to spend Christmas at "Raeburn," the old family homestead. My grandmother and grandfather had been abroad for years, and this being the first Christmas for so long that the old house was opened, they wanted to fill it with bright young faces and merry laughter, to crowd out the voiceless memories which lurked in every corner, and so a whole party of us had come—cousins, first, second and third, in fact of all degrees. Speaking of cousins, isn't it strange that very often the further removed the nearer they seem? At least George Stewart was only my third cousin by blood, and yet he always assumed more on the strength of our relationship than any of my first cousins, and, somehow, in my own heart I did not mind it at all, though I did tease him so.

But I must go on with my story. It was Christmas Eve, and the old house was quiet at last. We girls had all gone to our rooms after a merry evening together. Fannie and Rose had the room near grandma's, while Kate and Lillie were just opposite. Some one had to sleep alone at the other end of the hall, and, after long consultation, it was decided that I should go, for I had rashly boasted of never being afraid. I will confess to feeling a little lonely when all was quiet, and the deep shadows in the corners of the room seemed very dark, for the light of my candle did not reach far. There were three doors in my room, and after fastening securely the one into the entry, I merely turned the handles of the others, and finding them locked inside, did not care to explore any further just then. I must have been a long time undressing, for the clock struck the hour of midnight as I put out my light. Even then I could not go to sleep, but found myself wondering what was behind those doors that I had not opened, and I determined to have a regular exploring expedition the next day. There were so many romantic stories attached to this old house. I had even heard hints of private staircases, shut up rooms, &c., and had always delighted in mysteries.

I think I must have been asleep for a short time, when I suddenly found myself awake with a start, and a curious impression that I was listening for something. There certainly was a sound overhead, but what was it? It came again more clearly, and I distinguished a faint, broken melody, and yet imperfect, like some one playing a long-forgotten air on a piano where some of the strings were broken. Three times it came, like the verses of a song, and though there were no words, it seemed to speak to my very heart, and I thought of George, and how sorrowfully he had looked at me that evening as I had passed him without saying "good night." It was only to tease him, and I had pretended not to see his proffered hand, but had taken Willie Thorne's arm instead, and we had walked up the broad staircase together.

Again, all was still, only a long-drawn sigh seemed to echo my own through the room, and came from the direction of the furthest door. Without a sensation of fear, only an ill-defined feeling of pain and regret, I sank to sleep, and when I woke the morning sun was shining brightly enough to dispel all illusions. I resolved to say nothing to the girls, but quietly to explore and see what was to be found, for I knew perfectly well that what I had heard was no dream. So I got up long before breakfast, and after completing my toilet, threw wide the shutters and opened the first door nearest the entry. Only an empty closet! Disappointed but slightly relieved, I closed it and went over to the other.

The key turned hard in the lock as if it had not been opened for a long time. Then the door stood wide, and I saw a flight of stairs, but only presaic wooden steps, like those leading to any garret. I started bravely up, and soon found myself in a large loft or attic, filled with odds and ends.

First, an old spinning-wheel caught my eye, relic of our most industrious great grandmothers. Then a stack of old firearms, with which our ancestors, the bold Raes, may have shed the blood of daring foes, or, perhaps, and I am afraid more likely, have only done damage among the crows that came to steal from their spacious cornfields. Lastly, beyond these, and behind a pile of mattings and boxes, I came upon an old piano. It quite startled me, at first, but then the broad daylight was very reassuring, and I am not nervous. It was very old and of a most curious shape, and evidently had been very elegant in its day. I tried to lift the lid, and found it locked, but as I touched it a shiver ran through me, for I was convinced now that this was what my ghostly music had come from last night, and I determined to find out before another day had passed who it had belonged to, and what restless spirit still haunted its worn strings.

So, after breakfast, when all the others had gone to church, I went into my grandmother's room to sit with her, for she was not very strong, dear old lady, and rarely went out of the house in Winter.

After we were nicely settled, and had got through our morning's reading, I told her of my last night's adventure, and my subsequent researches, and begged her to tell me all about the old piano that I had found in the attic. She smiled at my earnestness, but did not seem at all surprised or incredulous, for, though she herself had never heard the music I spoke of, there had been others long ago, she said, who, sleeping in that room on Christmas Eve, had been known to hear faint sounds, coming as if from the old piano above, though it was always locked, and the key had been lost. The coincidence, at least, was very strange, taken in connection with the history attached to it, and which my grandmother then proceeded to relate to me.

"Many years ago," said my grandmother, "when your great-great-great-grandfather was alive, this house was full of life and merriment; for your Aunt Annie—your great-great-aunt, for whom you are named, child—lived here with her father and brothers. She was as bright and sunny as the day was long, but so full of mischief and coquetry that she gave the heart-ache to all the young men, far and near, and yet had suffered never a pang herself. I am afraid that a spice of her coquetry has descended to this generation too, my dear," said the old lady, gazing fondly, but reproachfully at me. "I felt sorry to see the look in poor George's eyes, last night, as you turned away from him on the stairs—"

"Oh, do please go on, grandmother dear," said I, "I am so much interested in the story." But in my own wicked little heart I was sorry too, and inwardly resolved to make up for it to him on the first opportunity.

"Well, your Aunt Annie always had the house full, and some of her cousins and young friends were always staying there. Among the gentlemen who were their frequent visitors was a young naval officer, Robert Carrol, whom they suspected Annie of preferring. Of course, as girls will, they all teased her most unmercifully about him, and consequently she would hardly speak to him sometimes, and just because in her own heart she knew that to talk with him one hour was better to her than a whole day with all the others.

"The poor fellow evidently had no eyes for any one else, but he was very reserved and sensitive, and did not go in boldly and make love to her, as any other man would have done, but stood and worshiped afar off. They say he was a very fine musician, and sang beautifully, and not only that but he composed songs for Annie to sing; for she had a lovely voice, and would sing sweet old ballads to us in the long Summer evenings with wonderful pathos and feeling.

"As the days went by the time drew near for Robert to join his ship. Early in December his orders came, and he was to leave the day after Christmas.

"He loved Annie so dearly that he felt he could not go away from her so long without asking for some assurance that his love was returned, and yet he could not bear to think of hearing her say she could never love him. Sometimes she treated him so coldly, almost rudely, and yet again, when they were alone, he could have sworn her eyes spoke a different language.

"The day before Christmas came, and still no word had been spoken. On the morning of that day Robert wrote a note to her, and inclosed in it a little song he had written, and in the note he said"—"But stay," said my grandmother, "I think I can show you the very note itself," and going to her desk she took from it an old yellow piece of manuscript music, so faded as to be almost illegible, and a little sheet of paper. "These," she said, "were found up in the attic among other old letters and private family papers when we came back, and though I destroyed the rest I kept these," and taking up the note she read it aloud. It was very short, and ran thus:

Annie, darling, will you be my wife? and may I go away with the hope warm at my heart that when I come back I may claim you as my own? Little one, if it is to be, and you can love me, will you sing my song for me tonight when I come. If there is no hope for me you will sing something else, and I will know my fate at once, and it will better to learn it so than to give you the pain of telling me. But somehow I feel hopeful, and shall come with a brave heart in spite of the fact that your sweet voice is to sing me into life or death.

Forever yours, in this world and the next.

ROBERT.

"He sealed the note inclosing the song, and sent it over by his servant. As the man was going into the gate he met Annie's youngest brother, Harry, a little fellow of ten years old, who snatched the note from him, and said, 'Oh! I'll take it to sister Annie, Tom,' and ran off. So Thomas walked away with [illegible] Annie's little girl, who was four years old, and so charmed the child by an effort to please her that the little important was content with no other company. The result was that this demonstration of friendship brought the father of the child and Mr. Stanton into conversation. The result was that the most powerful journalist of the opposition Press, and the severest toward Mr. Stanton throughout the war, became a personal friend of the great Secretary.

The only relaxation Mr. Stanton indulged in while Secretary was characteristic of the natural amiability of his nature. Every morning he appeared in the street with a basket on his arm, intent upon doing his own marketing. On this important occasion he was wont to throw aside the cares of his official position. He walked slowly, and if ever, when out of doors, he indulged in a moment of gossip, or gave expression to the language of courtesy, it was on this journey to and from the market. Having selected his dealer, he gave the man his patronage, and this person was probably the only man in Washington who had no hesitation in saying that he pleased to Mr. Stanton, with the certainty of being patiently listened to, and getting a kind answer in return. Very little examination into the under-currents of Mr. Stanton's life will show how little he was really understood, not only by his enemies, but by the majority of his personal friends.—Harper's Magazine.

THE WICKED STEP-MOTHER.

A SERBIAN STORY.

There was once on a time a step-mother who hated her step-daughter exceedingly, because she was more beautiful than her own daughter whom she had brought with her into the house. By and by, the father learned also to hate his own child; he scolded her and beat her just to please his wife. One day his wife said to him, "Let us send your daughter away! Let her look look out for herself in the world!" Upon this the man asked, "Where can we send her? Where can the poor girl go alone?" Then the wife said, "If you will not do this, husband, I will live no longer with you. You had better take her to-morrow out of the house. You can lead her into the forest, and then steal away from her and hurry home!" She said this so often that at length he consented, but said, "At least prepare the girl something for her journey, that she may not die the first day of hunger."

The step-mother therefore made a cake, and the next morning early, the father led the girl far away into the very heart of the forest, and there left her and went back home. The poor girl, left alone, wandered all day about the wood, but could find no way out of it. When it grew dark, she got up into a tree to pass the night, fearing lest some wild beasts would eat her if she remained on the ground. And, indeed, all night long the wolves were howling under the tree, so that the poor girl trembled so much that she could hardly keep herself from falling. When day dawned, she descended from the tree and walked on again, hoping to find some way out of the forest. But the wood always grew thicker and thicker, and seemed to have no end. In the evening, while she was looking for a tree in which she might remain safely over the night, all at once she saw something shining in the forest. So she went on, hoping to find some shelter, and at length came to a fine large house. The gates were open, so she went in, and walked through a great many rooms, each one more beautiful than the other. On a table in one room she found a candle burning. She thought this must be the house of some robbers; but she was not afraid, for she reasoned with herself: Robbers have reason to fear robbers, but I have none—I will tell them that I will serve them gladly for a piece of bread."

Then she took the cake from her bag, said grace, and began to eat. Just as she had begun to eat a cock came into the room, and sprung upon the table to reach the cake, so the girl crumbled some of it for him. Then a little dog came in and jumped quite friendly upon her, so she broke a piece from her cake for the little dog, and took him on her knee and petted and fed him. After that came in a cat also, and the girl fed her too. At last she heard a great noise, as if some great beast was coming, and was greatly frightened when a lion came into the room. But the lion moved his tail in such a friendly way, and looked so very kindly, that she took heart, and offered him a piece of cake. The lion took it and began to lick her hand, and the girl had no longer any fear of him, so she stroked him gently and fed him with the cake. Suddenly she heard a great noise of weapons, and almost swooned as a creature in a bear-skin entered the room. The cock, the dog, the cat and the lion all ran to it and jumped about it affectionately, showing in all possible ways their great joy. The poor girl thought it a very strange beast, and expected it would jump upon her and kill her. But the fearful thing threw the bear-skin from its head and shoulders, and all the room shone and glittered with its golden ornaments. The poor girl almost lost her senses when she saw before her a handsome man beautifully dressed. But he came up to her and said, "Don't be afraid, my dear! I am not a bad man; I am the son of the king, and when I wish to hunt I come here and use this bear-skin as a disguise lest the people should recognize me. Those who see me believe that I am a ghost and run away from me. No one dares to come into this house, knowing that I often come here. You are the only person who has ventured in. How did you know that I am not a ghost?" Then she told him she had never heard of him or of the house, but that her step-mother had driven her away from home, and she told him all that had happened to her. When he heard this, he was very sorry, and said, "Your step-mother hated you, but God has been kind to you. I will marry you if you will be my wife—will you?" "Yes!" she replied. Next day he took her to his father's palace and married her. After some time she begged to be allowed to go to see her father. So her husband allowed her to go, and she dressed herself all in gold and went to her father's house. The father happened to be away from home, and the step-mother, seeing her coming, was afraid lest she had come to revenge herself. So she hurried to meet her and said, "You see that it was I who sent you on the road to happiness." The step-daughter kissed her, and embraced her half-sister. Then the girl said she was very sorry that she had not found her father at home, and, on her going away, she gave plenty of money to her step-mother. When, however, she had gone away, the stepmother shook her fist after her and cried, "Wait a little, you shall not be the only one so dressed out; to-morrow I will send my own daughter after you the same way!"

When her husband came home at night she told him all that had happened, and said: "What do you think, husband? would it not be a good thing to send my girl also into the wood to try her fortune; for your girl, whom we sent there, never came back until now, and now she has come, glittering in gold?

The man sighed and agreed to the proposal. Next day the step-mother prepared for her daughter plenty of cakes and roasted meats, and then sent her with the father into the forest. The man led her deep into the forest, as he had done his own daughter, and there left her. Finding the father did not return, she began to seek a way to get home, and soon came in sight of the house in the forest. She entered it, and seeing no one, fastened the door inside, saying as she did so, "If God himself comes I will not open to Him." Then she took out of her bag the baked meats and cakes and began to eat. While she was eating, the sock, the dog and the cat came in suddenly, and began to play about her affectionately, hoping she would give them something; but she became quite angry, and exclaimed: "The devil take you! I have hardly enough for myself; do you think I will give any to you?" Then she began to beat them; whereat the dog howled, and the lion hearing it rushed in furiously, caught the girl and killed her. Next day the king's son came with his wife to aunt. She immediately recognized her sister's dress, and gathered together the fragments of the body, which she took to her step-mother. She found her father at home this time, and he was greatly pleased to hear that his daughter was married to the king's son. When, however, he heard what had happened with the daughter of his wife, he was very sorry, but said, "Her mother has deserved this from the hand of God, because she hated you without a cause. There she is at the well; I will go and tell her."

When the step-mother heard what had happened to her daughter, she said to her husband, "I cannot bear your daughter! I cannot bear to look at her! Let us kill her and her husband. If you will not consent, I will come down into this well!" "I cannot kill my own child," returned he. "Well, then," cried she, "if you will not kill her, I change into a cuckoo bird" and so she jumped down into the well.—Good Words.

CRICKET IN ENGLAND.—The best player in a village club, and the captain of a school eleven, if not for other reasons unusually unpopular, is surrounded by a halo of glory which falls to the successful in no other sport. Great things are expected of him, he is looked upon with admiring eyes, and is indeed a great man. "Ah, it is all very well," you hear, "but wait till Brown goes in, Smith and Robinson are out, but wait till Brown appears, then you will see how we shall beat you, bowl him out if you can." His right hand will atone for the shortcomings of many smaller men; his prowess make up the deficiency of his side. Or look at a match between All England, and twenty-two of Clodshire, watch the clodpoles between the innings, how they throng wonderingly round the chiefs of the eleven. That's him, that's Daft, wait till he takes the bat, then you'll "see summat like play." Or go to the "Bat and Ball" after the match, when the eleven are there, and see how their words are dwelt on by an admiring audience, and their very looks and demeanor made much of as the deliberate expressions of men great in their generation. Again, see the reception at Kennington Oval of a "Surrey pet" or a popular amateur, or the way in which Mr. Grace is treated by the undemonstrative aristocracy of "Lord's," and agree with me that cricket teaches hero-worship in its full. What power the captain of the Eton or the Winchester eleven has, what an influence over his fellows, not merely in the Summer when his deeds are before the public, but always from a memory of his prowess with bat or ball. There is one awkward point about this; there are many cricket clubs, and therefore many captains, and when two of these meet a certain amount of difficulty arises in choosing which is the hero to be worshipped. In a match where the best players of a district are collected, and two or more good men known in their own circle and esteemed highly there play together, who is to say which is the best; who is to crown the real King of Brentford? Each considers himself superior to the other, each remembers the plaudits of his own admirers, forgets that it is possible that they may be prejudiced, and ignores the reputation of his neighbor. The result is a jealousy among the orientains which is difficult to be overcome, and which shows itself even in the best matches.—London Society.

ANECDOTES OF DANIEL WEBSTER.—Mr. Webster was full of fun and humor at times, and when in company with a few intimate friends he unbent, and exhibited his wonderful versatility of talent, to the delight of all listeners. He had marvelous narrative powers, was a capital mimic, and imitated a broken dialect to perfection. He was not an unamiable man, and never said a malicious thing in all his life; but when perturbed or uncomfortable, either from indisposition or the effect of exuberant convivality, he was as unapproachable as a porcupine, and often indulged in peevish exclamations and satirical remarks.

I once heard him describe a visit that he made to the elder Adams, at Quincy, a few months before his death. The venerable sage, then ninety years of age, received him with cordiality, thanking him for his civility in coming to see him. He was lying in bed, supported by pillows, a heavy, plethoric man, inclining to dropsy, and drawing his breath with much difficulty. He seemed to pump up his words, Mr. Webster said, from a great depth, and spoke in short sentences.

"How are you, Mr. Adams?" inquired his visitor.

"Feeble and nearly worn out," was the reply. "The old tenement is in a state of dilapidation, and from what I can judge of the intentions of the landlord, he is not likely to lay anything more out in repairs."

Meeting him at the Astor House in 184-, I mentioned that Nathaniel P. Tallmadge, lately Governor of Wisconsin, was dead. "Ah! is Tallmadge dead? Well, all the tears that will be shed on the occasion be in an onion."

Managing politicians who assumed to control the movements of the people were his aversion. Mr. Webster went down to his grave with the firm conviction that he had been defrauded of the Presidency by the jealousy and intrigues of his rivals. He entertained no doubt that the great mass of his countrymen were anxious to make him President, but were overruled and thwarted by the party leaders.

He accosted me once on Pennsylvania-avenue: "How long have you been in town?"

"A couple of days."

"Why have you not been to see me?"

"I don't know where you live."

"At the old place, on Louisiana-avenue."

"Near the church on Sixth-street?"

"Yes; directly under the droppings of the sanctuary."

Rejoining rather irrelevantly, I said, "I did not know there was much sanctity in the droppings from a Unitarian church."

"I used the phrase as decorous merely. Have you seen Uncle Truman since you arrived?"

I answered in the affirmative.

"Is he now, as usual, responsible for all mankind?"

I said there seemed to be a heap of trouble on the old man's mind.

"The last time I saw him," said he, "he fairly staggered under the weight of empire."—Harper's Magazine.

A QUEEN OF FRENCH SOCIETY IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. If we allow the pen to pass the prescribed limit, it is merely to close the dynasty of female sovereigns that had, with general acclamation, ruled French society during the eighteenth century. Mme. Récamier may claim the honor, though with but slight éclat, of being the last of that illustrious series. Like Mme. de Lambert, whose salon had flourished during the infancy of the eighteenth century, Mme. Récamier, who witnessed the birth of the succeeding age, was averse to the discussion of all questions that tended to stir the passions, or that were of immediate public interest. She rather ostentatiously eschewed the slightest appearance of possessing political opinions; in the productions and tendences of literature she never even affected to possess a shadow of interest, and certainly no woman enjoying equal celebrity ever exercised less direct influence over social opinion; yet in the world's estimation she is amply justified in taking her position among the potentates of society. With perfect freedom from passion in all its compromising and intense forms; with few preferences that were other than charmingly languid; with a prudence which was mathematically correct; with a degree of half-concealed firmness of disposition rarely to be found in her sex; with little feeling, and that little perfectly under control, Mme. Récamier possessed physical beauty of the highest order, and of a nature universally captivating. Armed with such formidable weapons, she was both invulnerable and irresistible. Her personal influence, indeed, seems to have had no bounds but those prescribed by her will. She could accommodate her amiability to suit any character. Never, for a moment endangering her own self-possession, or losing sight of the special object sought to be obtained, she could play upon human affections and feelings with the most refined and exquisite delicacy; she glided into the citadel of the heart with a step so stealthy that all effective resistance was paralyzed. To degrade her, however, to the level of a mere coquette would be unseemly and unjust. There may have been occasionally a little affectation of affection, but there was surely no capriciousness or careless heartlessness, in her intercourse with those upon whom she deigned to smile; for her heart, which had little capacity, and was almost void, had been schooled by her understanding in every charitable device. She meted to every one with minute exactitude the amount of consideration, sympathy, or affection which propriety suggested, instinctively conscious of the degree of fascination to which the mind or heart of any individual was capable of being subjected without endangering its equilibrium. Her love—that is to say, the quality or sentiment which occupied the place of love in her heart—was so impartial, so widely diffused, so singularly free from all the weaknesses of human passion, that it often seemed to verge upon the preternatural, or at, at least, too delicately be insinuated, the unnatural. No length of time, no disparity in social position, no divergency of opinion, could influence Mme. Récamier in her personal preferences, or induce her to swerve to the right or the left of the course she had determined to pursue. Under the Directory, under the Empire, under the Restoration, under the July Monarchy, she was the same: she endeared herself, with decorously modulated sympathy, as much to the modest printer, M. Ballanche, as to Prince Augustus of Prussia, to Benjamin Constant as to Madame de Montmorency, to the Duchesse de Chevreuse as to Queen Hortense. By much copious affection, such perfect impartiality, Mme. Récamier achieved for her salon a latitude of comprehension, if not of popularity, unsurpassed by any of its predecessors under the old monarchy. "Vraie reine de salon, dans sa petite chambre de l'Abbaye-aux-Bois comme dans son hôtel de la Chaussée-d'Antin, reine charmante, mais bien plus reine que femme."

A SAVAGE BABEL OF LANGUAGES.—Among the one hundred islands occupied by the Melanesian race the Bishop of Wellington informs us there are no less than two hundred languages, differing from each other as much as Dutch and German, and this diversity of languages and dialects is confirmed by Mr. Turner in his account of his nineteen years' residence in Polynesia. Among the Penons, or savage tribes of Cambodia, Mr. Adnhot speaks of the great number of dialects spoken by tribes whose manners and customs are the same. Among the Mbugu of Central Africa, Barth tells us that, owing to the absence of friendly intercourse between the several tribes and families, such a number of dialects had sprung up as to render communication between them difficult. Upon the River Amazon Mr. Bates mentions that in a single canoe he found several individuals speaking languages so different as to be unintelligible to the others.—Nature.

A NEW SENSE.—When passing along a street I can distinguish shops from private houses, and even point out the doors and windows, &c., and this whether the doors be shut or open. When a window consists of one entire sheet of glass, it is more difficult to discover them one composed of a number of small panes. From this it would appear that glass is a bad conductor of sensation, or at any rate of the sensation specially connected with this sense. When objects below the face are perceived, the sensation seems to come in an oblique line from the object to the upper part of the face. While walking with a friend in Forest Lane, Stratford, I said, pointing to a fence which separated the road from a field, "Those rails are not quite as high as my shoulder." He looked at them and said they were higher. We, however, measured, and found them about three inches lower than my shoulder. At the time of making this observation I was about four feet from the rails. Certainly in this instance facial perception was more accurate than sight. When the lower part of a fence is brickwork, and the upper part rails, the fact can be detected, and the line where the two meet easily perceived. Irregularities in heights and projections, and indentations in walls, can also be discovered. A similar sense belongs to some part of the animal creation, and especially to cats, who have been known to fly about a room without breaking anything, even after the cruel experiment has been made of extracting their eyes.—Lucy's Blindness and the Blind.

THE HERO OF RICHARDSON'S NOVELS.—Richardson's Lovelace, drawn for a warning to profligates, affected the public mind violently, because it was founded on something true, and because that something was so dilated as to rouse and startle readers incapable of appreciating a finer delineation. Richardson, purposing to be essentially a moral writer, overmarked the characters which he put forward either as models of bad or good; and Sir Charles Grandison, the pattern of virtue, is even more palpably exaggerated than Lovelace, the example of vice. Both representations made a vivid impression on the society of their own epoch, and not only in their own country; in France, their effect was quite as remarkable, and there Lovelace is still quoted and still pointed at with a warning finger; the character having survived there, partly because, as a foreign importation, it may be supposed by the French to be a true type of English libertines, and partly because it has undergone a certain modification in the process of translation. It is a dead thing now to English society; only curiously considered now and then by students as a fragment of antiquity in a museum; the excess in the coloring, which fixed the gaze of the town when it first appeared, made its permanence as a great work of art an impossibility.—Macmillan's Magazine.

OPERA SINGERS.—A tenor voice is the thing a modern countryman ought to ask Jupiter for, if the god offered to grant any one request he might prefer, as he did Hodge in the fable. For a tenor voice of high quality and a good ear for music confer on their lucky possessor the power to convert all he touches into gold. Perhaps a splendid soprano is even better. A prima donna will be fought for by rival managers—will be implored to go to all parts of the compass at once; and, failing this, will spend her year in London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Cairo, and New-York. One lady has been receiving £150 a night in London all this season, and is to have £200 a night in New-York. The true history of a peasant girl who becomes a prima donna in grand opera would be a very instructive tale; from the day when, a little child, it is found out that she sings better than any other child in the village, to the day when she makes her last curtsey before the footlights. What a story! The village gossips remark the sweetness of her voice—the parents find a patron who pays for masters—she is discovered by a manager, speculated in, brought out, makes a great success—is followed about from capital to capital by a tribe of pensioners, including her respectable parents, brothers, sisters, uncles, aunts, and cousins to the fiftieth remove, every sort of master she ever had—everybody that can show the least claim to help empty her purse. And they all fawn on her, flatter her, cajole, and deceive her, until she marries the man she loves, who pawns her diamonds, breaks her heart, and dissipates twice the income of a princess of the blood at the gaming-table. Though this picture has too often been realized in the history of the lyric stage, it must in fairness be said that there are many happy exceptions in the cases of great public favorites, who have found in their husbands better managers of their property and their affairs of business than any less interested agents possibly could become.—Once a Week.

DRAMATIC CHARACTER OF WAGNER'S MUSIC.—In truth, he comes forward as the prophet of true dramatic art, which is the soul of both poetry and painting, as well as of music. This spirit wanting, the music supplied as coloring or illustration becomes false and artificial. The same spirit inspires true acting, and the true presentation of human character. One actor, for instance, relies on the most comic turns of voice and manner, and extorts laughter; but if these do not flow from the character he is playing, there is nothing dramatic present. So with many of our later writers for the stage, who, ignorant of character, furnish out their figures with amusing speeches, catch-words, and "good things," which have no relation to the character, and have no appropriateness. A mere colorless speech, which, standing by itself, would seem utterly ineffective and even unimportant, may, when appropriate to a particular place of thought, become the only proper expression; while the most piquant saying would be false, and actually destroy the idea of this character. Many of Shakespeare's speeches might seem to the unskilled mere colloquialisms, but are exactly suited to the situation. So it should be with music; and this will be better seen by considering a moment on what principles some of the most popular operas have been written, and for what reasons some of the most favorite morceaux have deserved their reputation. A writer like Donizetti, or one of our English opera composers, would cast about for an effective story to "set." The writer of such a story requires great skill and technical craft, the author having to arrange his work so as to afford the best openings for the effective trios, quartets, finales, tenor solo, and dashing airs for the soprano. In the case of a writer like Meyerbeer, processions and scenes of comp has to be provided. In this sort of work Scribe and Meyerbeer excelled. The composer came, found the story agreeable and to his liking, and proceeded to set it to his mount have set any other story of equal merit. He may have had a pretty tenor air in his head, an effective quartet which he could work in. He found the whole excellently suited the characters of that brilliant party, Grisi, Lablache, Mario. He wished also to write effective music that they could sing, and that might be sung in drawing-rooms or concert halls. Again, in the treatment of individual pieces the same deference to the voice was observed. There was the regular pattern of the solo for the dashing soprano, which, in Donizetti's, Bellini's, Rossini's, or Verdi's hands, was the same; and each of these masters might have shifted such airs from one to another of their operas with little difference in the effect. The orchestral accompaniment was often of the poorest, such as any journeyman could have filled in. Verdi's melodious baritone songs, which some indignant King or ill-treated husband in a Spanish drama sings, have all very much the same character.—Tinsley's Magazine.

STANTON'S FIRST MEETING WITH LINCOLN.—Mr. Stanton's permanent residence in the City of Washington was forced upon him against his will. His constantly-increasing practice, as he approached the meridian splendor of his legal attainments, finally occupied all his time before the Supreme Court of the United States. On his arrival at the national capital he quietly procured an unostentatious suite of rooms, and putting on the door-post to their street entrance the modest and well-worn sign he brought from Steubenville, Ohio, he was prepared for business; and the sign was never taken down while Mr. Stanton lived. It was in this culminating era of his studious life, (1859,) when nothing but the absorbing routine of a lawyer's life interested him, that he was one morning, while in his office, and always before his clerks made their appearance, confronted by a tall, ungainly-looking Western man, who, upon holding out his hand, was first greeted with a look from those strange, dreamy eyes which habitually glanced through Mr. Stanton's spectacles, and the next moment Abraham Lincoln and Edwin M. Stanton warmly greeted each other. They were associate counsel in the great "McCormick Reaper Case," which at the time, from the large pecuniary interest involved, attracted public attention.

How little these two men at that instant understood the mighty future in which they were to be associated as prominent actors! But Providence ordained that in this humble and unromantic way Mr. Lincoln should become intimately acquainted with the sympathetic heart, unflinching patriotism, and iron firmness of Mr. Stanton, upon which last-named quality Mr. Lincoln, in the darkest hours of his tribulations at the White House, was destined to lean for support.

It would be sadly interesting, now that both these men sleep in the grave, if the casual conversations of Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Stanton at this time could be read by living men. It is not difficult to imagine how Mr. Lincoln's common sense and practical knowledge of the value of the McCormick reaper, which had aided so much in the development of the wealth of the prairies of Illinois, illuminated the hard, dry, legal experience of Mr. Stanton, and gave the Washington attorney new views of the relations and dependencies of practical farming life with jurisprudence.—Harpers Magazine.

QUEER PEOPLE AT OLD BRIGHTON.—There were some singular specimens of ladies in the Old Brighton days. None more singular than Lady Clermont, who used to take a teaspoonful of brandy in her tea by first pouring the brandy over the back of the spoon and then correcting the mistake, which she attributed to defect of sight, by filling the spoon in the ordinary way. Of a different temper was the fair and ambitious Lady Haugerstone. My lady invited the Prince to a rural festival at her villa near the Spa. She received him in character, as a milkmaid, ready to concoct a syllabub for the royal guest. She carried in one hand a silver pail, in the other a milking stool, such as the most ingenious of artistic upholsterers could alone invent. A characteristic hat, with long cherry-colored ribbons, adorned her head, and the milkmaid's apron would have fetched hundreds of pounds for its lace. The syllabub, however, was never accomplished, some absurd accident brought the attempt to an end, which after brief laughter was altogether forgotten. In contrast with this gentle masquerade, was the bold, loudly-brogued, but beautiful Lady Nagle, with her husband Sir Edmund's miniature suspended from the longest of chains, flinging about as she moved, but always, as she said, near her heart. Sir Benjamin Bloomfield was another of the old Brighton celebrities. He owed his position as Master of the Household to the Prince of Wales to an accident. "Slade," said his Royal Highness to the Colonel of that name, "do you know any gentleman who plays the violoncello?" "I only know one, Sir," replied the Colonel, "Capt. Bloomfield, of the Artillery." "Bring him here to dinner," rejoined the Prince, "and tell him to bring his violoncello with him; we'll play something together after dinner." The Captain played to good purpose. The Prince again invited him as a guest; subsequently he attached the violoncello player to his household, and Sir Benjamin became as well-known a figure on and about the Steyne as the Prince himself was.—Temple Bar.

LEVER'S ESCAPE FROM DROWNING.—In 1858, Lever obtained the post of Vice-Consul at Spezzia, where he remained for several years. Singular to relate, he was near meeting here the fate that befell Shelley. It was a favorite amusement of himself and his family to go out for hours in a little boat on the waters of the beautiful bay. One day when he and his daughter were so engaged, a sudden squall struck the little craft and overturned it. They were both excellent swimmers, and at once struck out boldly for the shore, nearly two miles distant. The girl's presence of mind never failed her, and she reached the land safely with her father, bearing with her a little lap-dog that was quite exhausted.—Macmillan's Magazine.

HEROIC OBEDIENCE TO DUTY.—Many can still recollect when tidings came of the silent heroism with which more than five hundred soldiers, in the wreck of the Birkenhead, met death in the spirit of obedience to duty; and that, too, when there was none of the excitement of battle and of victory to cheer them on. The soldiers stood in their ranks on the deck of the sinking ship while the women and children were quietly put into one of the boats. "Every one did as he was directed," says Capt. Wright, one of the few who escaped to tell the tale; "and there was not a murmur or a cry among them till the vessel made her final plunge. All the officers received their orders, and had them carried out, as if the men were embarking instead of going to the bottom. There was only this difference, that I never saw any embarkation conducted with so little noise and confusion. When the vessel was just going down, the commander" not of the soldiers, but of the ship—"called out, 'All those who can swim, jump overboard, and make for the boats.' The officers begged the men not to do as the commander said, as the boat with the women must be swamped. Not more than three made the attempt. And so they sank among the waves, carrying the habits of duty, which they had learnt as soldiers, into that last act of self-sacrifice."—Sir Edward Strachey in Good Words.

CIVIL MARRIAGE IN FRANCE ACCORDING TO THE PETIT CODE.—But to return to our civil lovers. The day the contract is signed is a great and solemn day; there is dining and much ceremony. At the signing, "After the notary has read the contract aloud, the future rises, salutes his betrothed as if asking her approval, signs the deed, and offers her the pen, with which she writes her signature, after which the pen is passed on to others, who sign according to rigid precedence," invariably observed on these lively occasions. "Salutes his betrothed!" Be good enough to remember the agreeable phrase. On a certain day the indispensable civil marriage takes place. My exquisite Elise, my amiable Rosa, if you marry in France you must be married before the Maire or his clerks. You may afterward be married at Church if you like. In England you have the liberty of going to church only, or to the register's office only, and we still hold by the conviction that the more sacred the rest the greater the blessing. However, when the French couple have been united civilement, the young wife first signs the register and then passes the pen to the husband, who salutes her, and says, "Thank you, Madame!" "Salutes her." Well, the term ought not to puzzle her, but it does. In former times we are told that the notary, as soon as the contract was duly signed, had the right to salute the bride. The second he could claim the bride herself, which he generally claimed—only salute, here, that is, respectfully how to her. As far as we can understand the "Little Code," a French lover (if you can call him a lover) up to this time, that is to say, up to the celebration of the marriage, does not presume to lay a kiss upon the cheek of ——— nonsense; let us honestly out with it, and say, does not kiss the lips of the young girl who is to be his wife till death do part them. See what dreadful results ensue from letting your papa and mamma make love for you.—Temple Bar.

RATISBON.—Ratisbon is full of historic and art associations. St. Peter's Cathedral is a noble Gothic structure, remarkable for its beautiful façade and richly-carved projecting porch. On the north side of the transept is the Ascot Tower, up whose winding but stepless ascent the materials for building the church were carried on the backs of mules. The spires of the cathedral, which have long stood unfinished, are now in process of completion. The grotesque and lavishly decorated tombs that for a long while marred the interior of the edifice have been removed, and symmetry and elegance have taken their place. The church and its cloisters contain a number of handsome monuments, tomb-stones and sarcophagi.

The Rathhaus, or Town hall, a gloomy and extensive pile, was mostly built in the fourteenth century. The imperial diet held its sessions there from 1663 to 1806, and the saloons of the diet have not been altered, and still contain the benches, arm-chairs, and tables used by the Ambassadors. The criminal dungeons in which prisoners were tortured are shown, for a fee; and, on going into them I noticed the bench of the Judge, protected by an iron grating lest he might be killed—as he deserved to be—by the miserable wretches in whose suffering he delighted. There are the rack, the wheel, the thumb-screw, the spiked helmet, the burning pincers, the fiery cowl, the straining-cord, the bone-crusher, the fiery furnace, and all those implements of torment which we blush to think were freely used by our ancestors little more than a century ago. The collection of devilish devices for producing pain is larger at Ratisbon than at the National Museum in Munich or the Arsenal in Venice. In the Thiergarten, in the back of the palace, is a small circular temple, in a bust of Kepler, the renowned astronomer, who died there in 1630. A stone bridge six centuries old connects Ratisbon with Stadt and Hof, (almost entirely buried down by the French in 1809,) on the opposite side of the Danube.

The beer of Ratisbon is held in high repute, and the citizens and their neighbors drink it to excess. Though much less agreeable to my palate than the Munich beer—the "nectar of malt liquors"—I was glad to visit some of the breweries, in order to observe how much men, women and children enjoy the national beverage. The Brewery of the Hospital, as it is called, has a large, dingy hall, crowded from morning till night with the actively bibulous and over-thirsty Bavarians. They go there in family groups, especially in the evening, and spend hours with pipes and gossip over their generous and foaming mugs. For a few kreutzers they purchase more genuine pleasure than we of this Western hemisphere could with their earnings for a whole year.—Harper's Magazine.

PUTTING LIGHTNING IN A BOTTLE.—It may be mentioned that in one of Franklin's letters, written apparently before the year 1750, the points of resemblance between lightning and the spark obtained by friction from an electrical apparatus are distinctly stated. It is but some thirty years ago that Andrew Crosse, the famous amateur electrician, was asked by an elderly gentleman, who came to witness his experiments with two enormous Leyden jars charged by means of wires stretched for miles among the forest trees near Taunton: "Mr. Crosse, don't you think it is rather impious to bottle the lightning?"

"Let me answer your question by asking another," said Crosse, laughing. "Don't you think it might be considered rather impious to bottle the rain-water?"—All the Year Round.

TOASTS.—Women have long since ceased to be "toasts," but the sex is still honored collectively as "The Ladies." Taking a limited view of his subject, a benighted man at a bachelors' supper took the liberty of giving, "Our Future Wives—distance lends enchantment to the view!" The addenda at least would have been appreciated by the old fogy who, having escaped being caught by the "sweet briers in the garden of life," when asked for a toast, proposed "Woman—the morning-star of infancy, the day-star of manhood, the evening-star of age; bless our stars, and may they always be kept at a telescopic distance!" He would probably have made a very wry face at the old Scotch toast—

"May we a' be canty and couty,
An' ilk lad a wife in his bosom," although he might not have dared to decline the invitation, for in deep-drinking days it was held a great affront to refuse to accept a toast. Two young noblemen were staying at Brechin Castle, and Lord Panmure invited his tenant Panlathie to meet them at dinner, telling him to be sure and bring some money with him. As soon as the cloth was removed, Lord Panmure led off with the first toast: "All hats in the fire, or £20 on the table." Four hats were immediately in the fire. From one of the Englishmen came: "All coats in the fire, or £50 on the table," and four coats went off their owners' backs. The next toast was: "All boots in the fire, or £100 on the table." These came Panlathie's turn; crying out: "Two fore-teeth in the fire, or £200 on the table," and pulling his teeth out—false ones, of course—he threw them into the fire. The example was not followed; so Panlathie went home minus his hat, coat and boots, but with his pockets richer by £600. The story may be true, although we have read of a very similar performance in which Panlathie's part was played by witty Sir Charles Sedley, for such freaks jumped with our grandsires' notions of humor. The mining toast in Yorkshire is, "May all your labors be in vein." Punning toasts are rarer than would be supposed. Here are three old ones: "May our commanders have the eye of a Hawke and the heart of a Wolfe;" "May we never have a Fox too cunning nor a Pitt too deep;" "May our liberty never be swallowed in a Pitt." The statesman whose name is thus placed upon is credited with the authorship of "May the trade of Kidderminster be treddles under foot by all the world;" but according to another story, Sherkish when soliciting the votes of the shoemakers of Stafford, mightily offended the obtuse sons of Crispin by proposing at a dinner, "May the trade of Stafford be trampled under foot by all the world!" A quaker-witted company welcomed Judge Story's toast at the dinner in celebration of Everett's appointment as Ambassador to the Court of St. James: "Genius—sure to be welcomed where Everett goes!" a compliment responded to by the new-made Envoy with, "Law, Equity, and Jurisprudence—no efforts can raise them above one Story." The profane-sounding toast, "Dam the canals, sink the coal-pits, plant the minerals, consume the manufactures, disperse the commerce of Great Britain," has been attributed to Erskine and to Sugden, the engineer.—Chambers's Journal.

ECHO.—Modern science furnishes a less romantically poetic account of the unfortunate young woman of the Cephisus. Echoes, as we know well enough in these matter-of-fact days, are produced by the reflected waves of sound. When a sufficient interval exists between a direct and a reflected sound, we hear the latter in an echo. As Prof. Tyndall has shown in sound, like light, "may be reflected several times in succession, and as the reflected light under these circumstances becomes gradually fainter to the eye, so the successive echoes become fainter to the ear. A rather remarkable instance is cited by Sir John Herschel. In one of the cathedrals in Sicily the confessional was so placed that the whispers of the penitents were reflected by the curved roof, and brought to a focus at a distant part of the edifice. The fact was discovered by accident, and for some time the person who discovered it took pleasure in hearing, and bringing his friends to hear, utterances intended for the priest alone. The whispering-gallery of St. Paul's is another well-known instance. Here the faintest sound is conveyed from one side to the other of the dome, but it is not heard at any intermediate point. In Gloucester Cathedral, a gallery of an occasional form conveys a whisper seventy-five feet across the nave, while the ticks of a clock stop, as found by Professor Wheatstone, at the distance of the abbey Church of St. Albans to the other.—All the Year Round.

THE CHILDREN'S EXCURSIONS.

From Harper's Bazar.

In one of Charles Lamb's essays he sings "The Praise of Chimney-sweepers," and in his most delightful and characteristic strain. His vivid touch gives, episodically, one of the clearest glimpses of early morning in London they really are, before chimneys were swept with machinery, and that strange music of the sweep as the chimney-top had not forever ceased. "I reverenced these young Africans of our own growth," says Elia—"these sooty creatures who spent their cloth without remuneration, and from their little pulpits, (the tops of chimneys,) in the nipping air of a December morning, preach a lesson of patience to mankind." "But did sweepers sweep, and cry their wares, in London when I was a boy? Did he ever—say thirty years ago, if the memory reaches into that dim and fabulous antiquity—see the little figure with its brush at that awful and untrimmed hearth, and hear that thin, sad song?

The lot of poor children is hard at best, but that of the young sweep seemed a peculiar refinement of hardship. Not only was he poor and friendless—not only did the anxious mamma see him horribly belabored by a drunken master, but the great guardian of the children was made to lose his special identity. As a white child, he was obliterated. By that awful middle passage through the chimney he, who was not born of the servile color, became as black as a real African barbarian. It was pitiful. And now that those little sermons from those tiny pulpits are ended, and that thin, sad song is heard no more, it somehow seems as if, by that very fact, the condition of poor children were improved, and the probable average of happiness greater than ever before. Or does the terrible inverse rule here also, and like matter, as misery never lost, but only changed in form?

How Charles Lamb would have beamed and smiled could he have read the story of the newsboys' and boot-blacks' picnic, and of all the pleasures for all the poor children which have been the happy care of the NEW-YORK TIMES during the last Summer! But especially how Charles Lamb's friend, James White, would have rejoiced—Jem White, who "instituted an annual feast of chimney-sweepers, at which it was his pleasure to officiate as host and waiter. It was a solemn supper held in Smithfield upon the morrow of the Feast of St. Bartholomew, or, as Bartholomew's eve of another kind than that across the Straits of Dover. No other record of it survives than this mention of Lamb's, and that is perfect. Even one such glimpse is so pregnant, so suggestive! How many heroes are there in the Kamtschatkan White who have had to Elia to sing them? In society full of such happy thoughts so quantily realized? Is it the whim of multitudes of whom we never hear to make poor children happy? Was it not last year that Mr. Stanley, who has a beautiful place near Irvington, invited some ragged school or the boys of a lodging-house, to keep holiday under his trees and on his lawns? Actually inviting an irruption of young Goths and Vandals to his fair Isaly? Perhaps that was not his view of it. Perhaps he walked among them like the good Bishop among the young British slaves: "Angles—nay, angels," quoth his reverence.

Some good genius whispered to the TIMES—and beneficent let us not deny souls to corporations—that there was a diffused sentiment of good-will in the community, like solar rays, which, like those rays also, needed only to be brought to a focus to kindle a fire which would warm many a cold life-gem, and cook many a chowder for hungry younglings. The TIMES did not put the whisper by, but listened and smiled, and itself concentrated those wandering kindly rays, and cooked that veritable chowder. It proposed a subscription for money for poor children, and instantly, in little sums and large, nearly $3,000 were poured into its hand. The TIMES undertook the management, happily knowing that there are among its Jem Whites who also can preside at one chowder and at many sweepers only, but whose whole lives are a faithful service of poor children. Charles O'Connor, George Calder, John Gourlay, Samuel Lovett—these are some of the names of Jem White, today, names very well known and blessed by the tender sleepers at the lodging-houses, and to their superintendents, with that of other benevolent gentlemen, the newsboys' and boot-blacks' guests was increased.

The revelers assembled in what remains of the City Hall Park in the early morning. There was a surprising multitude, as one estimates, a thousand of the most juvenile were selected for happiness, the older and longer, those who were already in the shadow of manhood, being left for another time. Only 215 were taken. Think of that, friendly shade of James White! and not a whole year of sweepers and boys, as it chanced, with a national mad gone before, which the commandant of the post at Governor's Island permitted to come, and with bathers flying, the army of happy regardless marched away, shouting, chaffing, and cheering. Every passer-by looked on the surprised, as the TIMES Market-street and then embarking upon a barge, were off for Oriental Grove, up the East River, where they were, to go ashore to enjoy themselves. The sport was immense and rough, but not ill-natured. Every boy stood to his gun. Boys who learn life for themselves at the age of six must be that, or they will never be known at so young a fifteen. Nature, according to Mr. Darwin, selects for men only boys who stand to their guns. There were 215 boys, and each received a ticket, and passed down to the lower deck, and exchanged his ticket for a huge sandwich, and came immediately up on the other side and ate his huge sandwich for breakfast. The jolly rascals ate $21.50 worth of sandwiches. But confiscation of a neighbor's share was unknown. Generosity was the law.

There came to Oriental Grove like the Spanish sailors of Columbus to San Salvador. The Country was a new world to them. One of the little pilgrims had never seen a tree but twice or twice, and then upon the Battery! They climbed, they cut sticks, they roamed far and wide, they ate, they drank, they swam in the water, they tumbled, and tripped, and danced, and played ball, and all in the most boisterous way; but, it was remarked, all in good humor, and without "using language." The dialect of the lodging-house is not choice, but it was not offensive in this happy day. Scarcely were the tables, however, before chowder was served, and the unconscionable revelers consumed four worth of that delicious dish. And after chowder infinite frolic, and after the frolic more chowder! The last chowder was served in large buckets, so that the night-cap was ready, and while it was busily feeding the barge went off, and every boy was on board safe and sound, and ready for another. The passengers in all the steamers and craft they passed cheered, and were terrifically cheered in response. As they neared the City, a ladies board for Newport and their chowder was there handkerchiefs, and the boys roared in chorus with delight. Mr. Hatch's yacht fired a salute, as if they had been conquerors returning from a victorious campaign, and the news boys of a fresh chowder, and the boys ate it with a fresh chowder, and the boys ate it with a fresh chowder, and the boys ate it with

You may search Mr. GREELEY'S speeches in vain for a single kindly, or even just, reference to those who helped to defend the cause of the Union during the war. They are speeches which might just as well have been made by JEFF. DAVIS. At Pittsburg Mr. GREELEY grossly insulted the Union soldiers, telling them that when they met together it was for "the single purpose of rekindling the bitterness and hatred, the animosities and antipathies, the fears and exultations of civil war." This was not only grossly untrue, but it is a studied attack on a class which is and always must be entitled to the gratitude of the nation. Have not soldiers as much right to hold a Convention as labor reformers, temperance reformers, Fentonite reformers, or any other body of men? Why should they be singled out for Mr. GREELEY'S insults? Probably they will let Mr. GREELEY know what they think of his taunts at the approaching elections.

If report speaks truly, the "reception" accorded to Mr. GREELEY at the Lincoln Club Rooms, last night, would have better befitted his associate on the Presidential ticket. The affair was noisy—not to say disorderly; and there were a number of people present who had evidently been indulging in—soft-shell crabs. The company was certainly promiscuous enough—MUDGETT and AUGUSTUS SCHELL, JOEL FITHIAN, who thrashed the Tribune City editor, and the Professor who called him a "coward" and other lovely names for two or three weeks after—these were but samples of the incongruous character of the assemblage. Mr. GREELEY told this motley and unsteady crowd that he had gone West to "disabuse the clouded minds" of the people. It is difficult to realize what sort of a process is here indicated, but it was painfully obvious that Tammany had sent rather more "clouded minds" to greet its candidate than were likely to be "disabused," or otherwise enlightened, during that evening at least.

Judged by the mortality records, New-York is exceptionally healthy at present, and for the first time in many months, will stand comparison with almost any European city of similar size. Last week the deaths reached the unusually low figure of 503, equal to an annual death rate of 26.8 per 1,000. When we remember that it is but little over two months ago since the mortality was equal to three times this rate, there is much reason for congratulation in the rapidity with which the City has returned to a normal bill of mortality.

Will some reader of the Tribune inquire of that paper why it so persistently suppresses all reference to HALL, SWEENY, and BERGMAN, and confines its remarks solely to TWEED? We want to see all the gang punished. The Tribune only wants to get at TWEED, because (as it frankly owns) TWEED advised his friends not to go to a Greeley meeting. The Tribune supported TWEED, HALL, and SWEENY, while we denounced them, and now still tries to shield all but one member of the gang, and would shield him if it could blackmail him into giving GREELEY his support—which, by the bye, is worth nothing to anybody.

In spite of the efforts of MARK LANIGAN and PESTON'S Professor of Journalism, the desired crowd was not forthcoming to greet the arrival of the Tammany candidate from the West. Mr. GREELEY is reported as looking "exhausted." That is hardly to be wondered at. After ten days of speech-making, in which each successive address was devoted either to explaining, contradicting or modifying some other speech that had preceded it, there is little room for surprise that Mr. GREELEY'S brain should be in somewhat of a whirl, and that his appearance should give evidence of the fact. His speech at Easton is suggestive of the general disorder of the Philosopher's mind. Mr. GREELEY coolly informed the people who have a vital interest in the iron industries of the Lehigh Valley, that the tariff was really of no consequence in determining the continued prosperity of their trade. Mr. WELLS has evidently half converted his candidate into renouncing the favorite economical theories of a lifetime—whether with or without the help of that "British gold" which, we understand, Mr. GREELEY has in his pocket not the Revenue Commissioner, we are unable to say. It would be rash to assert that Mr. WELLS has, so far, much credit of his pupil. He floundered about in a pitifully helpless way, between two perfectly contradictory theories of political economy, and is either ignorant or pretends to be ignorant of the fact that the real question for Pennsylvania is not how much iron is needed in the world, but how much is needed at a certain price. Unless Mr. GREELEY has been guilty of deliberate misrepresentation for the best part of his life, he must believe that neither the workmen nor the capitalists of Pennsylvania are ready to compete on equal terms with the rest of the world in the production of iron. The tariff, of which his Democratic Congress (unfettered by executive veto) would make pretty short work, must, according to all Mr. GREELEY'S teachings, be a vital necessity to the great industries of Pennsylvania, and its abolition must mean ruin. On the whole, this Easton speech only gave another proof of the depth of duplicity to which the Tammany candidate is prepared to descend to get votes.

Religion and Politics.

When FRANCIS KERNAN was nominated for Governor, it was done because he was, as the Tribune proudly boasted the next day, a "sincere and earnest Roman Catholic." Since then the Greeley papers have been constantly urging KERNAN'S religious opinions upon the people as the reason why they should elect him. Their speakers do the same. Thus HORATIO SEYMOUR spoke as follows at Oneida last week—we quote from a Greeley paper, the Utica Observer:

"In looking over the history of my State, I find that we have never had a Catholic Governor, though Catholics constitute about one-third of the population, and a very large share of the voters. One thing I cannot bear to have said. They have been voting for Protestants for nearly a hundred years, and I cannot bear to have it said that Protestants are more bigoted than Catholics, and cannot vote once for a Catholic in return. [Great applause.] Every public man in the State has asked Catholics for their votes. I ask them if they cannot reciprocate the favor by voting for an honest man?"

In short, the Greeleyites and Democrats are making of the canvass for Governor a purely sectarian issue. They have printed tickets or labels by tens of thousands with KERNAN'S name in a ring and a cross in the centre. One of these was placed in our hands in the streets the other day, and we have had a fac simile made of it—the original can be seen at our office:

These labels are being circulated by tens of thousands in the large cities of the State.

Is this wise on the part of our opponents? We say again, and we say it in all sincerity, that we are above all things anxious to keep religious questions out of this embittered strife. But our opponents seem resolved to force us into it. They raise the cry of "Catholicism against Protestantism," and have sent forth the cross stamped on their political tickets as a sign of war. Are they not afraid of arousing the Protestant feeling of the State by this most scandalous proceeding, or do they believe that Protestantism is dead? We appeal to them, in all sincerity, to stop this electioneering trick at once. The fight is hot enough already—for Heaven's sake do not let us import religious quarrels into it. But, if you do, look out for the consequences.

City Disorganization.

There are thirteen different Departments in the New-York City and County Government, besides several offices and commissions not directly controlled by any of the leading branches of local administration. In a large number of these Departments, the vicious methods of the old Tammany régime still prevail. There are payrolls unpurged of sinecures, clerical force disproportionate to the work done, and an amount of independence exercised in contracting expenditures equally at variance with law and a republican theory of Municipal government. The men who are supposed by the public to be occupied in looking after public business, are, to a great extent, engaged to the exclusion of everything else, in plotting and scheming so as to secure their own retention in office. The objective point of these efforts is the Legislature, and the people of New-York may as well understand in time, that unless they take this matter of Assembly nominations into their own hands, they will as certainly be disappointed as they were, last year, of a due measure of City reform. It is extremely desirable that the chief Executive officer of the City should be a man actively identified with the work of reform, and possessing the confidence of all honest citizens. But a Reform Mayor can do very little toward the reorganization of local government unless he is backed by intelligent and honest legislation. Under the Tweed charter his hands would be tied up from interfering with the tenure of office of any of the subordinate officials. He would be held responsible for the good government of the City, while being obliged to manage public business through the agency of men whom he had no share in appointing, and of whose character for either capacity or honesty he could not, in many cases, approve. All the essential portions of the Tweed charter must be swept out of the statute-book, before there can be a chance for the good government of the City, and local Reformers ought to exact a distinct pledge from the men they nominate for the Assembly, that they will use all possible endeavors to get this charter repealed.

A better illustration of the existing chaos the recent muddle about the affairs of the Department of Charities and Correction. The Department, like most of the others, overdrew its appropriation last year. The overdraft was got from the Tenth National Bank on the security of the members of the Board. Of the wisdom or legality of this step we have no means of judging, but it is certain that the Legislature failed to include in its deficiency bills any provision for meeting this particular case. Mayor HALL and Controller CONNOLLY were among the directors of the bank when the overdraft was allowed, and they had been too much accustomed to disregard the legal way of doing things to anticipate any difficulty in getting back the money. The bank continues, however, to be the creditor of the Commissioners of Charities and Correction to the amount of $277,000. As soon as the Board of Apportionment for this year was constituted, an appropriation was made for the purposes of the Department, and a monthly payment of some $125,000 has been made to them ever since. The Commissioners kept their account with the Tenth National Bank, but having in view the difficulty that might arise about the overdraft, they exacted from the bank managers a distinct pledge that the integrity of their monthly deposits should be respected, and that in no case should any portion of them be diverted to the payment of last year's overdraft. In defiance, however, of this arrangement, and in defiance of all provisions of law, the Tenth National Bank officials appropriated, the other day, a deposit of $125,000 lying at the credit of the Commissioners, and applied it to the liquidation of the overdraft of 1871. This was a simple act of brigandage, and yet the manager of the Tenth National Bank bears the title and draws the pay of Deputy Chamberlain of the City.

Other instances might be cited, to show how urgent is the necessity for having the strong hand of an honest and capable Executive officer at the helm of City affairs. The Fire Department is, for example, being run by the three Greeleyite Commissioners—HITCHMAN, HENNESSY and BLAIR, to the complete exclusion of Commissioners SHALER and GALWAY. No regular Board meetings are held, of which any record can be discovered, and requisitions for money are made, in defiance of law, without being signed by all the Commissioners. The Bat might be extended indefinitely, but as the time for a general readjustment of local affairs cannot be far distant, these may be sufficient to show its necessity.

Truthful John Crowquill.

The Tribune's Professor of Journalism, like Rev. Mr. Chadband, of oily memory, professes a high regard for truth. Mr. Chadband was fond of speculative inquiries into the nature of truth, though we are not told that he ever arrived at a perfect definition of the object of his adoration. The Professor, more fortunate than the metaphysical preacher, has been able to show us what he considers a perfect example of truth, illustrated by the assertions of a perfectly truthful man. Let no one hereafter doubt that the Professor is unable to distinguish between truth and falsehood. He certainly knows a truthful man when he sees him, and such an one he has recently held up to the admiring gaze of the readers of the Tribune.

Truthful "John Crowquill"—which is the name assumed by the Professor's ideal of a truthful man—on Friday published a letter in the Tribune, describing the woes which have been inflicted upon him by the Administration in his humble capacity as clerk in a Revenue Assessor's Office. Speaking in behalf of himself and his fellow-clerks, he asserts that their bodies are attacked "by subjecting them to hunger and cold." Nothing but Providence will prevent them "from starving to death" until November next. This hideous hunger and this prolonged process of continual shivering during the mild days of the coming October, are due neither to the parsimony of boarding-house keepers in point of hash, nor to the violence of chills and fever. It is the wicked Administration which thus fiendishly attacks the bodies of its revenue officials. The cause of this brutal conduct is evident. Since Gen. GRANT has, as the Tribune tells us, no supporters outside of the ranks of office-holders, it is only natural that he should thus shower his favors upon them. Such has been the uniform course of ambitious rulers who desired to court any particular class of the people in order to win their gratitude and affection. The office-holders are, we are told, enthusiastic in support of the Republican ticket. What else could be expected, since they have been bribed with hunger, and bought with cold? This is the lavish way in which the tyrant pampers his luxurious prætorians.

But Truthful John Crowquill does not care so much about his starved and shivering body as he does about the safety of his personal soul. With awful solemnity and really dreadful eloquence, he insists that the Administration "attacks our souls, and may well be called, without exaggeration, a league with hell." "Is my language," John goes on to ask, "too strong?" We should rather think not. No one but Mr. GREELEY himself has sufficient command of the cutting vocabulary to supply language strong enough to do justice to the public scoundrels who thus attack Mr. Crowquill's private soul. Unequaled meanness, as well as unparalleled malignity, must inspire the fiend who would attack so very small a soul as that which Mr. Crowquill leads us to suppose is now trembling in its presumably manly form.

The exact manner in which the soul of Crowquill is attacked is as follows: He is compelled to subscribe, out of a salary of $1,200 per year, twenty dollars every State Committee on the occasion of every State election. There being thirty-eight States in the Union, the amount of his annual contributions is thus seen to be no less than $760, leaving his income only $440. Even this small sum the Assessor, who has levied these contributions upon him, refuses to pay unless the unfortunate wretch consents to sign, on this miserable pittance, the Greeley petition. Of this sacrilegious outrage the Professor, remarks in his able way: "As a further refinement of cruelty and tyranny, he is compelled to take an oath that he has not subscribed to the Assessor, say, or his agent, which is a falsehood and a perjury. The writer is personally known to me as a truthful man, and his statements can be implicitly believed."

Here we arise, by way of Mr. Crowquill's suffering body and outraged soul, to the Professor's definition of a truthful man. Some one under an assumed name tells a preposterous story, and, moreover, admits that he is in the monthly habit of deliberate perjury. The Professor emphasizes the point that this man frequently takes an oath "which is a falsehood and a perjury," and in the same breath asserts that he is "personally known" to him "as a truthful man, and his statement can be implicitly believed."

"Let us, my friends," the Professor will probably say, in his next lecture on journalism, "inquire, in the spirit of love, what is a truthful man?" And thereupon, answering his own question, after the habit of lecturers, he will point to a life-size picture of Mr. "John Crowquill" taking an oath "which is a falsehood and a perjury," and he will blandly say, "Behold a truthful man, whose statements, when not under oath, can be implicitly believed." It is quite evident that John Crowquill is the Professor himself. The character fits him to a T. For he is always inventing gross untruths, committing newspaper perjury, and then boasting that he is a truthful man. The Professor has a trick of writing letters to himself—like that other poor creature, DOOLITTLE. Why not give his next lecture under his alias of John Crowquill?

College for Both Sexes.

Of the numerous phases of the woman's rights question, the most interesting to the popular mind is that of the co-education of the sexes. Several of our large institutions have adopted the plan, such as Cornell University, the University of Michigan, and the University of California; but the matter has recently came up before Harvard in a rather marked shape. In a report on the subject from the Overseers of the University, Rev. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE ably discusses the whole question, reviewing the arguments for and against the mixed system, in which he says: "Whether the proper time has come for introducing this change at Cambridge I do not undertake to say; but I believe the system is good in itself; that it is in accordance with the ideas of modern society; that in practice it has worked very well wherever tried, and that the sooner it can be introduced at Cambridge the better it will be for our excellent University." President WHITE has lately completed a thorough examination of what has been done in this direction both at home and abroad, and the result convinces him that the plan is wholly feasible and worthy of being carried out to the fullest possible extent, and so he has opened wide the doors of Cornell to both male and female. In the University of Michigan, one of the largest and most flourishing educational institutions in the United States, the mixed system has been in successful operation since 1870, and the resulting testimony is enthusiastic in favor of it.

Accepting the obvious truth that nature emphatically asserts that the sexes are destined to pass their lives together as relations and members of the social circle, it is difficult to see why that system of education is not the best and cheapest in the end which best fits men and women to become good parents and enlightened citizens. To insure these results, the intellectual and moral as well as the physical faculties must be brought into active and healthy play, and the evidence of those who have become familiar with the mixed system declares that it places men and women more in their natural positions, more as human beings who have to face life as a reality, than the old system, and that it better fits both classes for their future experience. The sexes being trained together have reciprocal interests excited and encouraged, and these interests are more allied to real life than the interests of an isolated community. Girls in what are known as young ladies' boarding schools and seminaries, undergo, as a rule, artificial training, are not always well looked after, and return home from their academical course with little real knowledge of the actual life that is before them, having instead an sentimental cloak that unfits them for such wives and mothers as they should become. Teachers of boys are unanimously agreed that male youth, where they have no associates but their fellows, have a strong tendency to coarseness in thought, word and deed; and that these corrupting influences leave, in many instances, a stain on the character which can seldom, if ever, be effaced.

It would thus seem that the separate system has many and grievous faults, and we are fain to acknowledge that it is so. Nothing is more calculated to make a gentleman of a low-minded young man than to put him into the society of virtuous women; and nothing so inspires self-confidence and good manners in heedless young girls as to allow them association with well-bred young men. And thus it is that mutual companionship of girls and boys offers the most effectual check to the growth of debasing tendencies in both sexes. The reports upon this subject show that the morality of young men trained with young women in educational pursuits is higher, and that a greater amount of order prevails than in separate institutions, while the young women have minds more evenly balanced, and are not so much given to indulge in sentimental dreams. They acquire an earnestness and refinement in striking contrast to the results of separate training establishments.

Two very forcible objections are brought against co-education. First, that it offers great facilities for entering into reckless matrimonial alliances. Of this we think the results are prudential to the female character. The advocates of the mixed system meet the foregoing by saying that the evidence tends in the opposite direction. "Long engagements," do not generally end in the marriage of the respective parties. As they come to know one another, they discover, in many instances, that they are not, perhaps, altogether suited to each other. It is a very true statement that a majority of the reckless matrimonial alliances spring from a superficial acquaintance, and that where both parties have an opportunity of knowing each other perfectly, the best results are most generally attained in marriage. They meet the other objection by saying that if the girls should be pure and well-conducted, so should boys be; that establishments that are unfit for girls to be sent to on this score, are equally unfit for boys, and they appeal to parents to sustain them in this position. They are very strong in quoting HORACE MANN, the most thorough and the most eminent of all of our educators. He became President of Antioch College in 1853, and when he first commenced his duties he had grave doubts as to the desirability of the plan of co-education. For five years he watched over the College and personally tested the system in every possible way. The result of his experience he communicated to his friend, the celebrated GEORGE COMBE, in the following letter: "We have really one of the most orderly, sober, diligent and exemplary institutions in the country. We passed through the last term, are more than half through this, and I have not had occasion to make a single entry of any misdemeanor in our record-book." Mrs. MANN, writing after her husband's decease, says: "No one conversant with the daily life of our College could deny the purity and high tone of its morals and manners. Mr. MANN thought that the monkish error of wholly repressing the natural instincts should be swept away, and that a generous culture should enlist them in the interests of purity."

Which is the Homicide?

Coroners' juries have a proscriptive right to be stupid and inconsequent, but the verdict rendered the other day in the inquest on the death of MARTIN STANFORD appears to have stretched this prerogative to the verge of idiocy. STANFORD was stabbed some time ago by one QUINN, and taken to Bellevue Hospital, whence, soon after, he was discharged to his friends. One night last week, being in First-avenue, STANFORD hailed a car which did not at once stop, and he was compelled to run some distance to catch it. On getting upon the front platform he had some words with the driver—upon what subject does not appear, but it is natural to presume, on the driver's omission to respond to his hail. The driver thereupon called the conductor and demanded that STANFORD should be put off the car, declaring he would not proceed until this was done. The conductor then pushed STANFORD off, not too gently, we may suppose, since he fell so violently as to reopen the wound made by QUINN. The unfortunate man was taken first to the nearest Police Precinct, and thence to the hospital, where next day he died.

All this appeared in the evidence taken on the inquest. It was also attempted on behalf of the conductor to show that STANFORD was drunk at the time of his ejectment. This the captain of the precinct to which he was brought positively denied. Upon this testimony the intelligent jury exonerated the conductor, and, after the fashion of their kind, practically brought in against QUINN a verdict of murder in the first degree. The absurdity of this is so plain that we need hardly pause to point it out. Certainly, if QUINN had not stabbed STANFORD, the latter might not have died from the effects of the conductor's violence. But it is no less true that, without this contributive cause, he had, to all legal intents, recovered from QUINN'S wound, as his discharge shows. On the same principle a man might be held responsible for death resulting from the accidental opening of a wound which he had inflicted five years before. Undoubtedly QUINN is a ruffian, who might well adorn a halter, and who is at least better in the State Prison than out of it. But if he is to be hanged, let him be hanged honestly and fairly. The case is certainly a curious and a difficult one, demanding much nicer treatment than can be accorded it by a Coroner's jury. Whatever the measure of QUINN'S guilt, the conductor is hardly to be held blameless, and we trust that the exact extent of his responsibility may be scrutinized and determined by some more competent tribunal. Even disorderly passengers, and there has as yet appeared nothing to show that STANFORD was on this occasion to be so classed—are not to be ejected with such unnecessary violence as to endanger their lives. That is a lesson which some conductors evidently need to learn, and which is very badly taught by the verdict in question.

"The Descent of Man."

A new and vigorous anti-Darwinite has turned up in the person of Dr. BREE. He is the decided opinion of this thinker that science has not yet solved the question of the Creator's mode of creation; and, if we may draw the conclusion from such of his reasonings as have come under our eye, Dr. BREE does not think science ever will. The general thesis of the Darwinites is, we suppose, that all animals have sprung from a limited number of original beings, whose descendants have become diversified in the passage of time. Dr. BREE stoutly maintains that this can by no means have been the case, and, inasmuch as his success would go to disprove the ignominious assumption touching our common origin set up in the Descent of Man, he is likely, we should say, to have plenty of warm supporters. It is certainly a remarkable circumstance that, at this stage of a controversy to which the contributions have been so voluminous, and for the determination of which the data are so many and accessible, the opinions of naturalists should still be so sharply divided and so diametrically opposed. The supposition is reasonable that some classes of organic and highly important facts, or alleged facts, should by this time have been settled; yet it is about positively true that all points that admit of question and conviction are found to be in most active conflict.

For example, Prof. AGASSIZ is said—and Dr. BREE builds some of his strongest arguments on the circumstance—to show that in former periods, in given districts, there were as many varieties of organized life as at present. Now, if at all times the world has been inhabited by as great a diversity of animals as exists now, Darwinism goes to the wall. The theory of "natural selection," involving the multiplication of types, or varieties, is thereby rendered untenable. Thus, Prof. AGASSIZ is claimed by Dr. BREE to be an anti-Darwinite, and, on similar grounds, so is the great French naturalist, FLOURENS. And, if the notoriously elaborate and learned analyses made by our great philosopher of fossils, shells, fishes, and the like, are to be depended upon, it would seem that the author of the Origin of Species has not a leg to stand on. Again, Dr. BREE declares that many of the supporting assertions of the Darwin school are absolutely false in fact. Thus, the well-known statements concerning the variation of animals under domestication, Dr. BREE totally challenges. He says the breeds commonly cited are either infertile or that they revert to the natural species. Thus, the cross between a dog and a jackal—and the same we suppose would hold between the dog and the coyote—"can revert to either the dog or the jackal in the fourth generation, but cannot perpetuate itself." A like reversion, we are told, to the original species, is observable in animals transplanted from the Old to the New World. If this be indeed true, it would follow that most interesting light might be shed on the primary origin of European races of men who come to America. The curious changes that transform the stout, ruddy individual of Western Europe into the sinewy, spare American after a few generations, have often been commented upon. The latter often becomes, in many characteristics, startlingly like the red aboriginal he displaces. It we suppose the latter, as is now so generally conjectured, to have originally sprung from Eastern Asia, the contact of the two suggests a reversion in startling corroboration of Dr. BREE'S theory. The Doctor, in observing that domestic hogs, left to wander freely in forests, go back in time and become wild boars; that the horse, similarly exempted from human meddling, acquires a constancy of color—bay-chestnut, under those circumstances, becoming not only his prevailing, but almost his only color, insists that it is the invariable tendency of species to go back always toward their origin, and that this is justly to be regarded as the definitive indication of their fixity. In other words, species tend to renew themselves rather than pass into other beings.

Of course this is directly opposed to Mr. DARWIN'S view, and what seems marvelous is, that the actual facts, which make all the difference in the matter, are not by common consent made out and set at rest. No one contends that water will run up-hill, although that wonderful man in England is still maintaining that the earth is not round; and the points at issue touched upon, as between Darwinites and Anti-Darwinites, strike us as at least as easy of demonstration as the latter phenomenon. Dr. BREE, in summing up his arguments, adopts, as their legitimate deduction, the idea formerly expressed by Prof. HAUGHTON, namely, that there is nothing "tentative" in nature. The concluding sentences of Dr. BREE'S treatise are as follows:

"We find, then, nothing tentative in any branch of nature. There is nothing tentative in astronomy. No planet ever seeks to move more perfectly in its orbit; it does so from the beginning. We have no evidence that light describes its path by a succession of attempts; it is singly, doubly, or centrally refracted, according to fixed conditions, and has all the appearance of having always been so. The socket and the axis round which birds' wings revolve are placed exactly in the position best suited to produce the best effect.

"And here again I find no tentative process. There is no evidence in nature of birds with imperfect wings; no proof of a succession of them; no tentative attempt. Wherever there have been no failures, there have been no tentatives; in other words, no failures at all. The graceful form of the lion, first tiger, and the expanded wings of the sweet albatross of COLERIDGE, speak to the ear of reason in language that cannot be misunderstood: 'The hand that made us is Divine.'"

FINE ARTS.

New Pictures and Sculptures.

About the middle of the present month, our fine art galleries will be rehung and thrown open for the season, and, we are assured will then present an array of paintings and sculpture surpassing anything heretofore exhibited in this City.

At the Gospel Gallery several fine works by Merle are expected, with three pictures by Geo. H. Boughton, Cabanel, Bouguereau, Achenbach, Knaus, and, indeed, all the leading painters of France and Germany will be fairly represented.

Mr. Schaus, we hear, has purchased largely during his extended tour in Europe, and the result of his diligence and good taste will shortly be apparent in his picture gallery.

The Snedecor Gallery will open for the season about the 15th inst. Among the attractions will be an entire department devoted to water colors, a growing taste for which is being rapidly developed by our fine art patrons. Among the pictures now on view at this gallery, are one by Kuwasseg—a Swiss scene, we believe—very nobly painted and charming in color; Mr. Bierstadt's "Yosemite," which has been restretched, and seems to have improved twenty per cent. since we saw it in the auction room; a remarkably fine study of "A Trout Brook," by Samuel Coleman, and several specimens by Weir and others. Some good photographs of war scenes, by Decaille, will also attract attention.

SCULPTURE.

We have heretofore called attention to the studies in plaster of some of our native wild animals by Mr. R. Kemeys. There is now an exhibition at Tiffany's a group by that artist representing a "Panther and Deer Fighting." The panther has been overthrown, and his long-horned adversary is taking advantage of his recumbent position to thrust his sharp antlers into his side, while the panther writhes with pain and fury, and vainly endeavors to grasp his nimble foe with claws and teeth. The forms are well studied, the muscles sufficiently brought out, without being too prominent, and the expression remarkably strong and natural.

The gigantic sculptured pillars recently recovered by Mr. Wood from the ruins of Diana's Temple at Ephesus have recently been setting in the British Museum, London. They are mutilated, but the designs are still clearly to be made out.

Music.

Boothe Theatre has been crowded by appreciative audiences during the past week. Mr. and Mrs. Rousby in "Green Pastures" having proved decidedly attractive. Proof of this is found in the advertisement which forms the new drama of "Night and Morning" so an indefinite time.....The "King Cole-tes" is still acted at the Grand Opera and "Diamonds" at the Fifth-avenue Theatre; but there are signs of change in both houses, and Mr. Daly will probably regale his patrons ere long with something "new and strange".....The maidens with factitious yellow tresses and county garments accomplished last night the end of their long tenure of Wallack's, and we are glad to say, the regular season of that establishment begins on next Tuesday. We understand the house is to be thoroughly cleansed and redecorated in the short intervening time—on instinct, we should say of unexampled celerity. The opening play is Mr. Gilbert's new comedy of "Pygmalion and Galatea," and Mr. Sothern has deferred his own opening for the sake of having it brought out. The piece will be acted under his own direction, and the management make promises as regards the mounting of it which the public well know can be depended upon.....Aimee, of course, continues to run at the Union-square Theatre. We observe that one object on which very proper stress was laid by the new management has so far been creditably attained. The quality of the audiences at their house has vastly improved, and it now takes rank in this wise with the best of our City theatres. Miss Ethel's performance of the heroine in her play has mellowed and expanded with practice, and the whole piece naturally works more smoothly than at first. A drama of Mr. Brougham's is understood to be in rehearsal here, but it is altogether uncertain when a time will be reached for its judicious production.....To-morrow night ushers in the opera season, and great expectations are entertained of its prosperous and fashionable character. Mr. Maretzek has been having some very hard rehearsing done, from which we have hopes that the ensemble of "L'Africaine" is to be more worthy of Meyerbeer's work than anything New-York has yet seen. The second opera to be sung is "Faust," with Muzio, Lucca and Sara, and Signors Vizzani and Sparapani. The Academy has been furbished up quite stylishly, and we are assured good work enough has been done on the stage, as regards new scenery, &c., to warrant popular gratitude. In all fairness, the stockholders are somewhat in arrears on this point, and we shall be pleased to find that they have cleared off the obligation.....The first Rubinstein matinée occurred at Steinway Hall yesterday. It was very largely attended, and the eminent pianist's recital of his transcription of "The Ruins of Athens" elicited applause so enthusiastic and long continued that, for the first time since his debut in this country, he consented to repeat it. To-morrow evening a Rubinstein concert will be given in Brooklyn, and Tuesday the company will appear in this City.....The Olympic Theatre is to be closed for two weeks for the purpose of refreshment and redecoration. On Oct. 14 the house will be reopened, and a series of opera bouffe representations, by Mlle. Aimée and a strong company of new artists will be commenced.....Messrs. Barrett & Palmer intend to open new Niblo's Garden on Monday, Nov. 4, with a magnificent fairy spectacle.....At Wood's Museum, Mr. Dominick Murray will this week act in a drama called "Escaped from Sing Sing".....The San Francisco Minstrels continue to attract audiences to the St. James Theatre, and to amuse them when in occupancy of that pretty little house.....Mr. Charles White finds his Athenæum an establishment most profitable to invest.....The new Emerson California Minstrels, under the experienced management of Mr. Thomas Maguire, are having a prosperous season of it at No. 730 Broadway.

Meme Gossip.

Miss Lydia Thompson and her company appeared at the Boston Globe Theatre Monday, and will fill a three weeks' engagement in that house.....Mr. Edwin Adams acted last week in Milwaukee.....Mrs. Macready acted last week in Worcester.....Mrs. D. P. Bowers performed in Albany.....Mr. J. E. Owens acted in Buffalo.....Mr. Fox and his company are to appear in Buffalo four nights this week.....Friday, Mr. Thomas' orchestra played in Syracuse.....Miss Fanny Price was to have appeared last week in Denver, Colorado.....Mr. Habelmann sang in "La Belle Helene" last week, in St. Louis.....Mrs. F. S. Chanfrau was last week at Ford's Grand Opera-house, in Baltimore.....Mr. W. J. Florence acted last week at the National Theatre, in Washington, in "Elisah Ogg".....Mr. F. S. Chanfrau was, last week, at the Boston Theatre.....About forty carpenters' assistants employed in the various theatres in Boston notified their employers that after Sept. 21 they should demand fifty cents increase of pay, making it $3 a night, $1 50 for matinées. The managers met Friday night, at the Parker House, and resolved that the salaries of night hands should remain as hitherto; that in the event of the parties now engaged in the capacity of night hands not conforming with the above resolution, they should be immediately discharged from the employ of the manager to whom they may be engaged; and that no persons should be engaged by any of the managers who had left their situations in consequence of demanding more than the regular salaries.

Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Charles Sanley and several other artists of note narrowly escaped death on the road to London, from the Worcester Festival on Sept. 13. A letter from Mr. Sanley to an esteemed fellow-artist in this City, gives details of the accident, which might have had most lamentable results. The letter is dated Sept. 14, and runs thus: "My dear L.: * * *, through the mercy of Providence, I am spared to write to you again. I returned from Worcester Festival yesterday evening. We were—Santley, (the violinist) Thomas, (the piano) Zerbini, father and son, Lloyd and myself—in a compartment; in the one behind were Mr. Lemmens and Mme. Lemmens Sherrington. We were getting toward Westbourne Park station, and were all rather sleepily inclined, when we were roused by a awful crash, and a shower of beer bottles, hats, &c., to the carriage. I felt directly that some terrible accident had occurred, but cannot give you an idea of the sensation I felt. I really believed that I was about to be launched into eternity. It was some time before we could make out what was the matter. When I looked out of the window on the station side, there was a heavy luggage-train, with the engine run quite close up to the rear of our carriage, on a line that crossed ours. I called out to the driver of the engine and asked him if it was the train that had struck us, and he replied that it was. We could not force open the doors, so I got out of the window as soon as I could, and guess my feelings when I found that the luggage-train had literally cut ours in two halves; it had struck the ingoing van which was directly in front of our carriage, and smashed it to atoms. Higher up the line, was the other half of the train, with the last two carriages overturned. There such confusion, such screaming of women to be let out; as you may imagine. The line strewed with luggage, double-basses, music, &c.—but, from what I could learn, nobody killed. Some were pretty well bruised in the overturned carriages. The guard was severely bruised on the head. * * * It was a sensation which I hope never to experience again. As we had been more in advance and the engine would have driven into our carriage, and then there would have been no hope."....The Genoese newspaper, of Savona, Italy, gives an account of the progress of the debut in Italy of the young American prima donna, Miss Violetta Colville. In its issue of Sept. 7 the Gazzetino says: "The evening of the benefit of this wonderful prima donna, Signorina Violetta Colville, was most brilliant, and passed off in a manner not recorded for a long time even in relation to Italy's greatest theatres. The auditorium, splendidly illuminated, was filled to repletion with the most elegant of the élite of Savona society. It was a tasteful tribute of admiration and esteem for that young, but already wried artist, who treads with such dazzling success her first stages in her most difficult profession, and who is rapidly, surely, to attain the most enviable position. Saluted with great applause on the rise of the curtain, Signorina Colville was enthusiastically greeted throughout the entire performance, especially in the duet in 'Rigoletto,' sung with Signor Wilhort, in a manner truly irreproachable, and fitted to justify the fervid plaudits of the audience. The duet, 'Caro nome,' she sang with most sublime and wonderful expression, each note being intoned with a voice fresh, sonorous and sympathetic; it equaled in its effect her last fairy act of the 'Elisir d'Amore;' it [illegible] received with an enthusiasm inexpressible, and in a manner in which we are at a loss for terms to describe. Three gorgeous panoramic tableaux followed in succession—of flowers with rich ribbons and a magnificent diadem of gold, were presented to her after her aria, in the midst of a perfect storm of bouquets, which inundated the stage; graceful little birds were wafted from the boxes, and hundreds of copies of a poem composed in her honor were showered upon the audience and upon the artist.... Under the caption "Music of the Future," the London Athenæum says: "Rumors are already surrounding regarding the new prima donna of the Italian opera-houses for the season of 1872-3. Thus, at Covent Garden, we hear of the engagements of Signor Montanaro, a tenore robusto in more senses than one, and of Signor Oliver Farani, another tenor from the secondary theatres in Italy. Signor Mandini is not to return; nor Mme. Pauline Lucca. At her Majesty's Opera we are to hear Signor Antonio Aramburo, who has, as the Italian critics write, a voce poderosa, and comes with a high reputation from Rome, Venice, Turin, Barcelona, etc. He is engaged for the new Opera-house in Milan, to appear in Donizetti's Favorita. There is also a Russian contralto, Mlle. Justina Maccvitz, who has studied at the Milan Conservatorium, and whose voice is declared to be equal to that of Mme. Alboni. Mlle. Maccvitz is said to possess the skill of a Pisaroni. A baritone of note, Signor Collini, of Madrid, now engaged at the San Carlo, in Naples, is also specified. The importations it instructs what has been often stated in these columns, that the "fidality" doctrine of Verdi's disciples has been a mere pretext, which has enabled them to follow a beaten track. Art is never still, and artists are never scarce. At the Grand Opera, in Paris, a new ballet, by MM. Nuitter and Giraud, called 'Gretna Green,' is in preparation. Handel's 'Harmonious Blacksmith' ought to be introduced in it. The engagement of Mlle. Rota Sanzalli, who is to dance in the ballet 'La Source,' is looked upon as likely to revive the popularity of terpsichorean pantomime. The new opera, 'Le Coupe du Roi de Thule,' is also in rehearsal. M. Faure is to reappear in the 'Trovatore,' and next in 'Don Juan.' The Paris Opéra Comique has been reopened, after thorough renovation, with Auber's 'Domino Noir' and Adolphe Adam's 'Chalet.' Boieldieu's charming opera, 'La Dame Blanche,' was to be revived. Hérold's 'Pré aux Clercs' was to be given, with Mme. Carvalho and M. Sainte-Foy. Then, within one week, four masterpieces of the French school were to be presented. The new week, Don Caesar de Bazan, will be the first novelty. It has been at length finally and prudently decided that there is to be only one Italian Opera-house in Paris for the season of 1872-3, and this one is to be under the direction of M. Vergier, who has engaged Mmes. Penco, Volpini, Pasqua, Brando, Torresi, Pozzi, Cantù, and Albani, sopranos; Signora Bracciolini, contralto; Signori Gardoni, Mongini, Manni, Ugolini, Rammi, Belart, and M. Capoul, tenors; Signori Colonnese, Delle Sedie, and M. Verger, (nephew of the impressario,) baritones; Signori Bagagiolo, Antonucci, Valro, and Tagliafico, bassos; and Signori Zucchini and Topal, buffos. Signor Ursano Fontana is the musical director; Signor Dami, conductor; Signor Braida, chorus-master; and Signor Nicholas Lablache, stage manager. Meyerbeer's 'Struensee' is in preparation at the Porte Saint-Martin. The tragedy is by the composer's brother, Michel Beer."..... Mr. J. C. Bulmeden writes to the Pall Mall Gazette: "I have received from Adelina Patti (la Marquise de Caux) a letter commenting on the beneficial results of the adoption of the 'French musical pitch' this last season at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. Mme. Patti remarks that her vocal organ has never been very much healthier, stronger and capable of sustaining the whole of the heavy operas throughout without the least fatigue to her voice at the close of the London season, owing to the use of 'le diapason normal.' Mme. Patti covered Covent Garden Theatre. The military authority in Paris has behaved in rather a high-handed way with the Vaudeville Theatre and M. Robert Halt, by laying its veto on a new piece, called "Madame Frameix," which was on the point of replacing "Rabagas," which is engaged for the new Opera-house in Milan, to appear in Donizetti's Favorita. There is also a Russian contralto, Mlle. Justina Maccvitz, who has studied at the Milan Conservatorium, and whose voice is declared to be equal to that of Mme. Alboni. Mlle. 7 per cent. Gold Interest. Mortgage $15,000 per Mile. Completed and Fully Equipped Railway, 220 miles Long, entirely within the State of Illinois. First Mortgage, Sinking Fund, Gold Bonds of the Springfield and ILLINOIS South-eastern Railway, Interest payable February and August, Free of Government Tax, at the Office of the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company in New-York.

PRICE 90 AND ACCRUED INTEREST.

These bonds represent an unusually light mortgage upon a finished Railway, fully equipped, situated centrally through one of the Richest and most Populous states of the Union. Remarkable for the great success of its different Railways, offer the indications to the investor seekers of PROFITABLE AND SAFE SECURITY.

The holders of this Bond has the right to vote at all elections. By the terms of a Traffic Guarantee Contract with the well-known CLEVELAND, COLUMBUS, CINCINNATI, AND INDIANAPOLIS RAILWAY, (four of whose Directors, including the President and Vice-President, are also DIRECTORS IN THE SPRINGFIELD AND ILLINOIS SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY,) a large number of these Bonds will be purchased by 105 annually at Par and accrued interest, giving the fortunate holders Eleven per cent. Profit on their investment, besides nearly nine per cent. interest.

We respectfully invite the attention of all capitalists to this security, as a particularly safe and desirable one.

Pamphlets and Maps, with full particulars, furnished by us on written or personal application.

PROPOSALS.

PROPOSALS FOR DIMENSION STONE REQUIRED IN THE CONSTRUCTION OF THE NEW GOVERNMENT BUILDING AT ST. LOUIS, MO.
OFFICE OF SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 21, 1872.

Sealed proposals will be received at this office until 12 o'clock M. of the 26th day of October, 1872, for furnishing and delivering at the site of the new Government building at St. Louis, Mo., all of the dimension required for the exterior of the building.

The species of stone from which a selection will be made will be confined to granite, marble and sandstones, and the qualities especially insisted upon will be uniformity of color and texture, durability, and the capacity for working under the chisel or hammer.

A sample block, twelve inches, showing on each face a different kind of cutting, and on one the natural fracture of the stone must be submitted with each bid.

No stone that has not been tested by actual use as cut stone in buildings for at least ten years will be considered, and absolute proof that it has been so used in the past will be required.

The stone must further have a good grain and be free from all discoloring substances, and the quarry from which it is procured must be fully opened and capable of furnishing the quality and quantity desired within one year.

About 60,000 cubic feet, more or less, will be required, the exact amount of the stones cannot now be given, but will approximate forty feet, the largest stone containing about 200 cubic feet.

The stones will be ordered on a schedule of net sizes, in order that the contractor may make proper allowances for cutting in the quarrying, and on this schedule payment will be made allowing an addition of one inch to each face on sandstone, marble block and of one-half inch to each cut face of sandstone.

Bidders will state how soon they can commence delivering the stone and the amount per week they can furnish of the stone; and the amount per week they can deliver. They will also state the average and maximum size of the stones that can be obtained from their quarry.

No bids will be received except from the owners or lessees of the quarries from which the stone is proposed to be furnished, and a certificate from the Recorder of the County in which the quarry is situated that the bidder is the owner or lessee of the quarry must accompany the bid.

All proposals must be made on and in full accordance with the printed forms to be obtained on application at this office, or from the Superintendent, Mr. Thomas Walsh, St. Louis, Mo., and must be accompanied by special bond in the sum of fifty thousand dollars, ($50,000) that the bidder will accept and perform the contract if awarded to him, and give bond therefor in the penal sum of one hundred thousand dollars, ($100,000) and a valid and binding lease of the quarry to the Government as security for the faithful performance of the contract, the lease to take effect upon the failure of the contractor to comply with the terms of the contract, said lease to authorize the Government to take full possession of the quarry and work it at the expense of the contractor in case of default.

The Department reserves the right to reject any or all bids, or to divide the contract and the two or more kinds of stone.

Proposals must be inclosed in a sealed envelope, indorsed, "Proposals for dimension stone for the new Government building, St. Louis, Mo.," and addressed to A. B. MULLETT, Supervising Architect.

THE PANORMO TRAGEDY

The Murderer Said to be in Custody in Brooklyn.

An "Associate" Thief Gives Information to the Police.

Discovery of the Club With Which the Fatal Blow Was Struck—Arrest of the Supposed Criminal.

The particulars in relation to the murder of Mr. Panormo, a Brooklyn music teacher, on the 3d of January last, are still fresh in the public mind. No clue could be obtained to the perpetrators of the foul deed; investigation only seemed to draw around the affair more closely the shroud of mystery, and finally, after a great deal of theorizing and planning without apparent results, the case seemed to have been given up as unfathomable. It is now stated that the man who struck the fatal blow is, and has been for weeks, a prisoner in Raymond-street Jail. The story of his discovery as the murderer is a singular one, and being the revelation of one who admits that he was a confederate of the assassin, must be taken for what it is worth. The name of this person is Wm. Higgins, a New-York thief.

During the past two years, the houses of many of the wealthy citizens of Brooklyn have been at various times despoiled of their silver-ware and valuables by a gang whose adroitness baffled the Police, and whose dealings in silver-ware as a specialty obtained for them the title of the "Silver Gang." So troublesome had these depredators become, that Capt. Ferry, of the Third Precinct, turned all his energies toward the breaking up and arrest of the gang. With this view officers in citizens' attire were sent into the districts most likely to be visited by the thieves, and, on the evening of the 26th of May last, secured the arrest of a fellow who was seen trying the doors of houses in First-place. At the station-house the prisoner gave his name as Wm. Higgins, a resident of New-York, but refused to give any explanation of the suspicious circumstances that led to his arrest. Nothing was found on his person except a pocket-pistol, and a thirty-foot tape line. There were certain peculiarities about the tape line, by which it was identified as the property of Mr. John Gilbert, of No. 257 President-street, whose house had been robbed about an hour previous to Higgins' arrest. This was the returning verdict, and Higgins finding himself confronted by a convicting witness, accepted the suggestion of Capt. Ferry that some benefit might possibly flow to him from a frank statement of what he might know concerning the numerous robberies that had been recently committed. The prisoner then gave explicit information that led to the arrest of almost, if not quite, the entire "silver gang," and the restoration of a large portion of the stolen property to its owners. These prisoners were all indicted, tried, and convicted principally by the evidence of Higgins.

These arrests were all made on the information given by the boy Higgins, whose statements had in every instance been verified, a fact which gives additional importance to his testimony with regard to the murder of Mr. Panormo.

After all this was accomplished, Capt. Ferry again visited Higgins to see if there was not something else he could impart. After a conversation with the prisoner, the latter went on to say:

"You see," said Higgins, "I was in the Tombs in New-York when that affair happened, and I came out in the morning after the night on which it occurred. I'd been taken in for fighting. Well, I was coming over to Brooklyn on the night of the day when I was released, (the night following the assault on Panormo,) and I was coming over with one of our chaps that we call 'Cockney,' he's an Englishman. When we get together—any of us—we generally tell each other what sort of luck we'd had, and says Cockney to me,

"'By G——, but we had a narrow escape last night with that ——— in Brooklyn.'

"What's that?" said I.

"'Oh,' says he, "Cassidy and I, and Scotty and O'Brien, came over here last night on an expedition, (meaning to rob some house,) and we didn't get a d—d thing. So one of the fellows said, 'Oh, let us go back.'

Cassidy said, "'Its a d—d shame to go back without anything.'

"'That's so,' said ———.

"'Well, let's lay for somebody,' said another.

"'Here you are, then,' said one of the four. "'Let's go for this ——— coming up, and see what he's got about him.'

"'This,' said Etienne, "' is just about what Cockney told me, Capt.,' and then he went on to say how they robbed Panormo.

"One of them grabbed him by the collar and said in a rough voice "What have you got about you? Come, pony up!" at the same time shaking Panormo.

As soon as he felt he was grasped he cried out, or attempted to cry out for help, and another of the four pulled out a pistol and "jabbed" him in the neck with the muzzle, and said, "'D—— your dirty soul, if you yell out again I'll blow your brains out.'" While feeling the muzzle of the pistol at his neck, Panormo stopped, and a third man proceeded "to go through him," and was just on the point of taking his gold watch, when the man who pulled the pistol on him (thinking Panormo would not dare to cry out) replaced the pistol in his pocket. Seeing the pistol disposed of, Panormo again cried out for help, and that cry cost him his life, for, with a terrible oath, O'Brien struck him on the temple with a club, and as the unfortunate victim was reeling backward from the effects of the blow, he again struck him, the club hitting him over the left eye and flat along the face to the upper lip, and this blow was the one which made the terrible wound, which was so fully described at the time.

Only two blows were struck, and the man who was robbing him of his watch, crushed in and seeing him felled and bleeding, they all ran off, and reached New-York in different directions. This is the story of the murder of Panormo, as told by Higgins, who gives his information from "Cockney," who himself was one of the actors and took part in the robbery.

The weapon Panormo was struck with is a club made of lignum vitæ, and exceedingly heavy. It is fourteen inches in length, and is what is known in the police force as "parade club." It is a size between a pocket club and a regular locust.

When Higgins had told his story Capt. Ferry asked him where Cockney and Cassidy were to be found, as the other two were already in jail on four or five charges of burglary.

Higgins said: "You'll be most likely to find Cassidy in Hannon's, and you'll find O'Brien's club there, too, for he used to board there. As for Cockney he's an English fellow, and speaks like a Cockney, that's why we gave him that nickname; he's most likely to be around some of them places in New-York."

Capt. Ferry then took a description of Cassidy and Cockney as minute as Higgins could possibly give it, and then set to work to try and arrest the men.

The same night after this interview with Higgins, Capt. Ferry disguised a number of his men as wharf-loungers and hard cases generally, and set them to watch in the vicinity of the haunts of Cassidy and Cockney. For days and nights these disguised officers kept their vigils, lounging around the wharves and lying out on the string-pieces, and were finally rewarded by the capture of Cassidy. Previously to Cassidy's arrest, however, some of the men had searched Hannon's place, No. 22 West-street, where, besides a quantity of silver-ware as stated, they found the designed club with which Panormo was murdered, precisely as described by Higgins, and in the very place indicated by him.

The officers had despaired of finding Cassidy and Cockney, when, on the 20th day of August, a man was seen sitting on the Battery who answered Higgins' description of Cassidy. Two of the disguised officers approached him, and one of them accosted him familiarly, calling him by name. Cassidy was thrown off his guard, and betrayed his identity. He was instantly put in irons and brought over to Brooklyn, and is still in custody.

"Cockney," whose right name is Kane, is supposed to be in Michigan. Two days ago the Police Department decided to pay the expenses of the two men to go after him.

October Dividends Payable in Boston.

The October dividends payable in Boston amount to over $6,700,000, the banks paying $2,487,000, and manufacturing companies, interest on bonds, insurance companies, &c., adding about $3,308,000. The following details are given:

The banks of Boston have been doing a good business for the shareholders the past six months, and we find the changes in dividends all one way. The Boston National increases from 4 to 5 per cent, Boylston 6 to 7, Howard 4 to 4½, Market 4 to 4½, Massachusetts 4 to 5, Mechanics' 4 to 5, People's 5 to 7, Revere 4 to 5, State 5 to 6, Union 5 to 5 and Webster 3 to 4 per cent.

In 1871 the Old Boston, Globe, Massachusetts, People's, Revere and State Banks paid net dividend, free of all taxes. This year the law has been again changed, and stockholders pay their own tax in the city or town, where residing. Parties who cannot be found, from defective registration or otherwise, are taxed as non-residents, and the tax is a lien on the stock, whether transferred since the first of May or not. The Freeman's National Bank will increase its capital stock from $600,000 to $800,000
